GENTLEMEN,—The College which resumes its work to-day, "exists for the purpose of promoting the study of religion, theology, and philosophy, without insisting upon the adoption of particular doctrines." This principle is of much wider application than is commonly supposed. In this country, it is true, the conception of religious fellowship without limitation of doctrine or definition of creed has been the inheritance only of an inconspicuous group of churches, which have found three small colleges sufficient for their needs. But it is also the basis of the theological faculty of a great modern university like the Victoria University at Manchester. Early in the last century it became the guiding principle of the Divinity School of Harvard University, the oldest of the American foundations, at Cambridge, Massachusetts. And it provides the field for the whole religious life of the Protestant Churches of an entire European State, the Federation of the Swiss Cantons. Among a robust and energetic people political freedom resulted in a remarkably thorough adoption of religious freedom also. Thirty-one years ago at Geneva the last vestiges of dogmatic control were swept away; and the Church Constitution declared that "any minister may preach and teach freely on his own responsibility, nor may this liberty be restricted either by confessions of faith or by liturgical formularies." The theological faculty of its university is no less free. When the Conference of "Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers" met within its walls seven weeks ago, the venerable head of the Faculty, Professor Chantre, affirmed that Unitarianism stood "for something more than opposition to an article of the ancient creeds"; it represented "a free and independent theology, with a method different from that of all orthodoxies, in which the search for truth was practised with the same sincerity as in history, science, or philosophy."

I.

I need not recite the well-worn tale of the steps by which this freedom was won for ourselves, or describe the intellectual, moral, and political forces which have shaped its operation abroad. To find anything really analogous to it we must go behind the schools of Christendom, and mingle with the philosophic theologians of Greece, or, as we may now add, of India. It is among the ironies of history that the great champion of spiritual liberty, who saved Christianity from lapsing into the stagnation of a Jewish sect, should at the same time have been the author of the idea of the Church, founded on specific formulæ such as that Jesus was the Messiah, and in that function, also Lord. Here was the germ of a Credo, with all its subsequent implications of exclusive salvation, and doom of death for those who remained outside. Such ideas might belong to the promoters of the Greek mysteries, they formed no part of the fabric of common religious thought. Socrates describes Athens as the most free-spoken state in Hellas, not having yet learned his own peril. Plato criticises unsparingly the sacred traditions of the gods, and declares truth the beginning of every good thing both to gods and men. The Sophists undertake to make men able to dispute about divine things, and the corresponding teachers of the Ganges Valley, as we see them around the person of Gotama, the Buddha, a century before the death of Socrates, publicly question every received belief.

No great religious teacher has analysed more clearly the moral and intellectual mischief of the controversial temper than the historic founder of Buddhism. But so completely did he impress upon his followers the love of truth and mutual goodwill, that the widest theological differences made no schism in his Order. Sects might multiply, but they were not torn by jealous rivalries. Even the difficult subject of the person of the Buddha produced no cleavage between opposite views. On the one hand, the men of what was called the "Little Vehicle" adhered to the ancient tradition which declared that he had lived and died as man, though superior by his Perfect Enlightenment to all other beings in the world. As man he had passed out of life, with that kind of passing away which left not a trace behind. His disciples, therefore, offered him no worship; they sang no hymns; they chanted no litanies; they uttered no prayer; they entreated no help or protection; they neither sought nor enjoyed any communion with the departed Teacher. On the other hand, the men of the "Great Vehicle" affirmed that their master was the Eternal and the Self-Subsistent. Not once only had he appeared on earth, and seemed to be born, to attain enlightenment, and die. Many a time had he worn the semblance of humanity for the welfare of men, but these manifestations did not destroy his everlasting calm. Around this Buddha rose a gorgeous ritual with praise and petition, altar, functionary, and incense. The metaphysical reality which the later scheme offered to faith, the original doctrine absolutely denied. The fellowship after which the believer aspired, to become one with the Buddha-nature, had no existence for the psychological nihilist of the primitive school, who asserted that life was strictly limited to the thought or feeling of the moment. The truth was summed up for the one in a system of ethical culture, leading to ultimate escape from the round of existences into the void without rebirth; for the other, it meant a religion of faith and love, realised through eternal union with the All-Knowing and All-Holy.

And yet, the professors of these two contradictory Buddhologies, the humanitarian and the theistic, lived and taught side by side. When the Chinese traveller, Yuan Chwang, arrived in 632 A.D., at the great University at Nālanda, he found them installed together. As he traversed the nine vast quadrangles round which its colossal buildings were erected, went from one to another of the hundred lecture-rooms, where ten thousand students were daily instructed by professors of all the sects, or entered the temples where different rituals were practised, different scriptures read, and different doctrines preached, no bitter sounds of controversy were heard. Under the great trees which adorned the gardens and the park, beside the lotus ponds brilliant with bloom, no less than in the academic precincts, there was no wrangling. A common reverence for the founder, a common homage to the same moral ideal, prevented freedom from degenerating into licence, and converted liberty into the bond of peace.

II.

A distinguished modern Buddhist has recently pleaded that the "absolute" character of one religion need not interfere with the absolute character of another. The Trinitarian theologian will hardly admit his contention that as Christianity already provides three "Absolutes" within its Godhead, it need not object to the juxtaposition of another outside. It would be more true to say that Buddhism has admitted two "absolute" religions within its own fold. Both the types which I have indicated were supposed to rest upon the word of an infallible Teacher; Japanese tradition naïvely assigning the first to an early, and the second to a later and more fully developed revelation in the final stage of his career. What will the student of theology make of such a plea? The interpreter of the Articles of the Church of England will tell him that the seeming virtues of the Buddha all had the nature of sin, and the preacher of the path of righteousness was therefore deserving of "God's wrath and condemnation." Nay, he will further be warned that if he "presumes to say that every man shall be saved by the law or sect that he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law and the light of nature," he will be "had accursed." If his conscience is vigorous enough to protest against this conclusion, and face the threatened doom, he may take refuge in some philosophical interpretation, under the great names of Schleiermacher or Hegel. They will assure him that there is in truth only one religion in idea and essence. This idea, this essence, lies hidden in all historic religions as their origin and their goal. One has developed it in one direction, another in another; and in Christianity alone has the idea attained complete expression. What is latent elsewhere is here actualised in full. The dim anticipations of earlier and imperfect systems are wrought by Jesus into imperishable form, and shadows melt and blend, absorbed into the realities of eternal light. In this way the "absolute" character of Christianity is justified from an exactly opposite point of view. Instead of writing "all false" (with the ecclesiastical theologian) over the map of human faiths, except where the stream of Christian revelation has spread from Nazareth, the philosophic theologian pronounces all true—implicitly. Their achievement, indeed, is incomplete, but their purpose is the same: and Christianity remains not only the highest, but the "absolute" religion. Echoes of this view are heard in our own day in the language of the most distinguished scholar in Christian dogmatics. Theological faculties, it is the warning of Prof. Harnack, should not pass beyond the investigation of the Christian religion, because Christianity in its purest form is not one religion beside others, but "the religion," or, as we might say, religion itself. And the reason for this is that Jesus is not one Master beside others, but the Master, and his gospel corresponds to the innate capacities of humanity unveiled in history. That is, indeed, a noble and inspiring faith; but neither philosophy nor science, as I understand them, permits us to ascribe finality to any single person, or to any specific body of truths.

The fact is that during the last generation the whole study of Christianity has entered on a new phase. Not only has one great religion after another arisen out of the dim and distant past, or even forced itself (as in the case of Japan) on our attention as a vital factor in the living present, but it has been discovered that many of these ancient faiths are intimately connected with Christianity itself. From the point of view of philosophy or science we have learnt that while the great religious personalities are, as it were, new centres of energy, imparting fresh impulses of life and thought to their age, they can never be independent of it. However they may stand above it, they must share its outlook, they are in part the products of its religious culture. They may break with its institutions, but they cannot emancipate themselves completely from the intellectual and moral standards which encompass them. From end to end of our Bible this fact is now made clear. You cannot understand the book of Genesis or the book of Revelation without constant reference to the mythological conceptions of ancient Babylonia. Turn to the prophets and you will find that their hopes for Israel are always conditioned by the national circumstances. They announce the divine purpose amid the clash of empires and the fall of kingdoms; time does not always realise their visions, but "God fulfils himself in many ways." With the Persian supremacy new suggestions of theodicy (to which it will be my duty in the coming session to invite your attention) fall on the fruitful soil of Judaism. The Messianic hope takes another form, and acquires a wider significance. Fresh problems of the world and its duration, the earth and heavens, and the regions of the dead, of the peoples and their claims to salvation, are forced upon the thought of Israel's seers. They find their solution on the one hand in the magnificent universalism of the later Psalms, with their splendid visions of the nations of the earth bound together in one polity of faith and peace, and, on the other, in expectations of judgment and the life to come, which beget an entire literature of Apocalypse. In to the midst of these hopes Jesus is born. The story of his life is related under the conviction that they are destined to be fulfilled in him. You will soon learn how complicated are the questions thus generated. Behind the literary inquiries as to the ultimate materials of our Gospels in early tradition, their first written forms, and the editorial activities under which they assumed their present shape, lie the far more significant historical inquiries "Are these things true?" What are the influences which have moulded the record? What was the actual Jesus whose radiant image gleams on us through the golden haze of the Gospel page? This is the greatest problem of historical religion. When you address yourselves to it, be not afraid that you are belittling an exalted object of faith; it must be the worthiest homage to his greatness to seek to know him as he really was.

III.

But for that purpose the Gospels must be read not in the light of the philosophical theology of the fourth century, but in the glowing expectations of the first. There is a certain atmosphere of intellectual culture, of moral passion, of religious imagination, which envelops them, and plays through them. You must accustom yourselves to this atmosphere; it is very different from our own. You must learn, for instance, to look out upon the world not as history has shown it to us, not as modern science now conceives it, but on the limited scale of the Hebrew universe lying plastic in God's hand, with its seven heavens above filled with thrones and dominions, powers and principalities, and the abyss below, the dwelling place of Satan and his hosts. The message that the kingdom of God is at hand brings Jesus into immediate conflict with these agencies. How is this to be explained? On the one side we are warned by the Bishop of Birmingham that if the theory of demoniacal possession was not true, Jesus was not even a perfect prophet. On the other, it is suggested by Prof. Sanday that the Eternal Word accepted this belief as part of his mental outfit just as he accepted the principles of Hebrew grammar, when he condescended to be born a Jew. With these theological alternatives historical science has nothing to do. It is concerned only with the facts; and the main facts for this purpose are that this belief had had a history of thousands of years in the adjacent countries of Babylonia and Egypt, that it was in truth a common possession of the Semitic race—nor theirs alone, for it belongs to the lower culture all around the world, and lives on this day in a hundred curious forms enshrined in the practice of higher faiths.

To this imaginative background, again, belongs the beautiful saying about the little ones whose "angels do always behold the face of my Father who is in Heaven." Under the symbol of an oriental court, where only the officers of the highest rank have the right of entry, Jewish belief pictured the heavenly king surrounded by the angels of the "Face" or "Presence." They stood at the summit of the celestial hierarchy. Near them (according to the "Secrets of Enoch") were "the angels over all the souls of men, who write down all their works and their lives before the face of the Lord." But the angels of the "little ones" are, strictly speaking, neither guardians nor recording officers. They belong to the groups of heavenly counterparts, like the heavenly Paradise, the heavenly Jerusalem, the heavenly sanctuary, the heavenly altar, and even the heavenly Torah (law), into which God looked when he would create the world. They correspond, as is now generally understood, to the Persian Fravashis, once the spirits of the dead, who became the invisible types of the realities of earth.

Or, once more, consider the singular complex of anticipations, suggested by the answer ascribed to Jesus, when Peter, boasting of the sacrifices of discipleship, inquires, "What then shall we have?" "In the regeneration," says Jesus solemnly, "when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." What is the "regeneration," the Palingenesia? It is the renewal of the world which apocalyptic faith had long learned to expect. It belongs ultimately, perhaps, to speculations of extreme antiquity about world-periods, possibly (in Babylonia) a great world-year, which must have been wide-spread through Western Asia. They even appear in India (were they derived from Mesopotamia?) after the Vedic age, and they were incorporated into early Buddhism, where they produced a very remarkable equivalent of the Messianic age. They probably modified, though in a different way, the conceptions of the last things which belonged to the cycle of Iranian hope. There they formed a striking feature in the splendid theodicy of the Zend Avesta, where the end of the existing order should arrive, the general resurrection and the last judgment should take place, the powers of evil should be for ever overthrown, and hell itself should be brought back for the enlargement of the world. The cyclic view of the cosmic history worked out by Hindu thought, has its match, curiously enough, in the Stoic philosophy, where the end of the world would be accomplished through a vast conflagration, the ekpurôsis, which is immediately followed by the palingenesia, or, as Cicero calls it, the renovatio. "In the renewal of the world," is in fact the phrase of the Syriac translators of the Peshitta. In this new world for which the later prophecy (Isa. lxv. 17, 18) had begun to look, the prayer "Thy kingdom come" should be fulfilled. The Son of Man should sit (like Vohu Mano, Ahura himself, and the Immortal Holy Ones) on a radiant throne, and there his twelve Apostles should share his high prerogative of judgment. To this group of expectations the Apostle Paul makes such definite reference, that it plainly occupied a large place in Christian hope. When he would dissuade the Corinthians from going before a secular tribunal for the settlement of their disputes, he asks them if they do not know that the saints shall judge the world—nay, he adds, "know ye not that ye shall judge angels?" The angelic powers were by no means all holy. In the second heaven Enoch saw regions of darkness where prisoners were suspended and the apostates who had been cast down from the fifth heaven awaited their eternal doom; while the earlier "Testament" of Levi locates there "fire and snow and ice, ready against the day of the ordinance of the Lord," for the punishment of the spirits of the lawless ones. In the heavenly ranks were principalities and authorities, which must be brought to nought, and the Messiah's reign would not reach its term till the last enemy should be subdued. With him, accordingly, would the saints be associated in co-sovereignty; and in this jurisdiction the twelve tribes of Israel are placed under the authority of the twelve apostles. I do not ask now whether this was really part of the thought of Jesus; it is part of the picture of him in the Gospels; and the student who is anxious to understand Christianity in the light of historical science, cannot ignore it.

IV.

Pass beyond the limits of Israel and its hopes, and you enter a world of religious phenomena, so varied as to be practically inexhaustible, and all the patient labour of the last thirty years has only begun to exhibit to us its contents. At every turn you are confronted with beliefs resembling those which pervade our New Testament, so that Prof. Cheyne has recently attempted in a very remarkable little volume, "Bible Problems," to trace archæologically the roots of four great doctrines associated with the person of Jesus—the Virgin Birth, the Descent into Hades, the Resurrection, and the Ascension. The inscriptions reveal to you the very language of Christianity in the making. The hymns and liturgies of other faiths derive their strength from similar ideas, and express similar aspirations. Does Jesus, according to the Gospels give sight to the blind, and call the dead back to life? So does Æsculapius. He, too, is wondrously born; he, too, is in danger in his infancy. He, too, heals the sick and raises the dead, till Zeus, jealous of this infringement of his prerogatives, smites him with his thunderbolt, and translates him to the world above. But from his heavenly seat he continues to exercise his healing power. His worship spreads all through Greece. After a great plague in Rome, in 291 B.C., it is planted on a sacred island in the Tiber. In the first century of our era you may follow it all round the Eastern Mediterranean. In Greece alone Pausanias mentions sixty-three Asklepeia. There were others in Asia Minor, Egypt, Sicily; nearly two hundred being still traceable. They were both sanctuaries and medical schools. A number of inscriptions relate details of cures, or consecrate the ex-votos, which are still dedicated at Loretto or Lourdes. The temple by the Tiber won special fame in the reign of Antoninus Pius, for the restoration of the sight of a blind man. Æsculapius himself bears the titles "king" and θέος σωτήρ, "divine saviour." He was even σωτὴρ τῶν ὅλων, saviour of the universe. In his cosmic significance he was thus identified with Zeus himself, and on earth he was felt to be "most loving to man" (cp. Tit. iii. 4). Harnack, in one of the fascinating chapters of his "Expansion of Christianity," has traced the action of these influences on later Christianity conceived as a religion of healing or salvation, medicine alike of body and of mind. It must be enough now to remind you that the god was believed to reveal himself to those who sought his aid, and Origen affirms that a great multitude, both of Greeks and barbarians, acknowledge that they "have frequently seen, and still see, no mere phantom, but Æsculapius himself, healing and doing good, and foretelling the future." Was it surprising, then, that in states of exalted emotion the disciple of Jesus should believe that he saw Christ? If religion is to be treated after the modern fashion, psychologically, as having a basis in experience, you cannot settle beforehand to affirm the one and deny the other.

Or, study the language which gathered in Egypt and in Syria, during the centuries before our era, round the conception of the divine King. In the temples by the Nile it is of immemorial antiquity; and the whole process of the incarnation is naïvely displayed upon the walls. In later days the Ptolemies were the "beneficent gods," Θεοὶ εὐεργέται. Ptolemy V., the "god manifest," was termed αἰωνόβιος, "immortal"; he was likened to the sun, and actually designated the living image of Zeus. Antiochus is the "God and Saviour." Julius Cæsar is called "Saviour" at Athens, and Ephesus described him as the "God manifest and the common Saviour of human life." Still more remarkable is the language of the inscriptions discovered a few years ago at Priené and Halicarnassus, by the German archæological expedition, instituting the birthday of Augustus as a general festival, from which the New Year should be dated. It is hailed as the beginning of life. Augustus has been sent by Providence for the welfare of man. He is a saviour destined to make war cease, so that the birthday of the "god" is become the beginning of glad tidings (evangelia) to the world, for he is the saviour of the whole human race. Elsewhere he is the son of Zeus the Liberator; or, again, lord of Europe and Asia, and star of all Greece, who has arisen as "great saviour Zeus." At Philæ, once more in the cycle of Egyptian theological ideas, he is himself identified with Zeus the Liberator with the remarkable addition, ἐκ Διὸς πατρός, "out of Father Zeus." It is probably a piece of that "vigour and rigour" which Matthew Arnold ridiculed in German criticism, when Soltau seeks in the inscriptions concerning the birthday of Augustus the actual origin of the Gospel narratives of the Nativity, just as I hold it equally overstrained to derive the shepherds of Luke from the Mithras-legend, or to identify the angels' throng with the shining devas of Buddhist story. But the accumulating force of these parallels which it has been the work of the historical science of the last decades to bring to light, enables us to realise with more and more clearness why the imagination of the early church should have chosen these forms in which to express its love and reverence. They were the forms which the religious culture of the age supplied, and there were no others. The Gentile language acquired new meaning when, to use Professor Gardner's happy figure, it was "baptized into Christ." But in entering this high fellowship did it carry with it historic truth?

It may be asserted, however, that these phrases were after all only the debased coinage of political flattery. Turn, then, to the group of ideas pervading the various mysteries through which the religions of Western Asia opened to the initiate the pathway of immortality and the promise of divine life. The early Christian salvation is bound up in its primitive form with the Messianic kingdom, the expectation of the resurrection and the judgment. It is something, that is, to be realised hereafter, at the end of the age. Side by side with this in the writings of the Apostle Paul, appears another type, effected through the mystical identification of the experience of the believer with the risen Christ, so that baptism becomes a symbolic communion with the Messiah's death and resurrection. Modern researches into the cults of Isis, of Attis, and above all of Mithra, have shown that here, too, the primitive Church was in contact with desires for spiritual re-birth that had long been deep-rooted in the East, though they had never entered Judaism. In the remarkable liturgy published two years ago by Professor Dieterich, the disciple prays to be re-born with the help of water and Spirit; he entreats the God to "abide" with him in his soul and not forsake him; and concludes, "Hail to thee, Lord, sovereign of water," and "Hail, founder of the earth! Hail, mighty one of Spirit. Lord, being born again I pass out of life, in that I am being exalted, and being exalted die. Born of the birth which begets life, I depart unto death, and go the way as thou hast instituted." Pfleiderer has not hesitated to suggest that the rites of Adonis, celebrated at Antioch to commemorate his death and resurrection, may have supplied to the Apostle Paul the mould into which he could pour the new life of Christian experience. The death of Attis was followed on the fourth day by the feast of joy which celebrated his ascension to the world of light. "Attis has returned from the realm of the dead," ran the message from the high-priest, "Rejoice ye in his parousia." It was apparently at the same festival that the priest anointed the mouths of the worshippers with the low chant:—

"Be of good cheer, ye faithful, for the god is saved:
For there will be salvation to us from our trials."

At any rate it is in this direction that modern inquiry is seeking for the antecedents of the Pauline doctrine of the fellowship of the Christian believer with his Lord, summed up (in contrast to the demands of the Jewish law) in the familiar formula "justification by faith." I will not now attempt to pursue these difficult ways, where the student must be content to take slow steps before any results can be said to be assured. Rather let me present to you an analogy from a totally different field, by way of illustrating what has been aptly called the "sympathy of religions."

V.

The higher faiths of India have this in common with Christianity that they are all of them religions of deliverance. To those who are entangled in the weary round of re-births they offer liberation; and, inasmuch as the detaining causes are mental blindness and moral wrong, they seek to rescue men from ignorance and sin. They are agreed, moreover, in rejecting legal morality or ceremonial rite. Only the higher insight and the disciplined will can secure release from the attachments of earth; and whether the higher insight consists (with Vedântism) in the recognition of what we might call the identity of the individual with universal Spirit, or (with early Buddhism) in the perception that there is no permanent spirit at all, either in the individual or the world, it matters not. Both demand essentially the same thing—the conquest of evil, the victory over self. But I have already remarked that the later Buddhism of the Great Vehicle accepted precisely those ontological realities which Gotama had himself so peremptorily rejected; and when once the Buddha had been recognised as the Eternal and the Self-Subsistent, a way of divine fellowship was open which had hitherto been closed. Was that to be attained through philosophical insight or through moral endeavour? There was a third answer possible, and it was at last discovered: deliverance was to be realised by faith. The schools indeed differed widely, and as the centuries passed, fresh subdivisions tended continually to arise, especially where Buddhism was still active, as in China and Japan. Already in the second century of our era the worship of a particular form of Buddha had been introduced into China, under the double name of Amitâbha and Amitâyus, "Infinite Light" and "Infinite Life." The origin of this remarkable cultus is unknown. It expressed itself in one of the most gorgeous of the Buddhist apocalypses, the exuberant delineation of the "Pure Land," where there is "no idea of self or others," and hence no "inequality, strife, or dispute"; where the blessed are "without envy because they do not hanker after the happiness of others," and being "full of beneficent and tender thought," by the light of wisdom shine more brightly than the sun.

This book became the foundation of the Pure Land Sect of Japan, under Gen-ku, in 1175 A.D. Birth in that world, in the eternal presence of the Buddha, is not, however, the reward of the believer's works. It is due, on the other hand, to an act of faith, which expressed itself in the invocation of the sacred name. This exercise, however, still carried with it some idea of merit: and though the Blessed One, at the moment of the believer's death, arrived with a heavenly escort to conduct him to the Land of Bliss, he still needed even there long service of righteousness ere he was ripe for the true goal of Buddhahood. It was reserved for Gen-ku's disciple Shin-ran, often (though, in my judgment, quite erroneously) called the Luther of Japan, to carry the principle of faith still further, to abandon all reliance on personal merit, Ji-riki, or "self-power," and rely solely on the Ta-riki, the "other power" of Amitâbha's original Vow. On this conception of "salvation by faith" arose the Shin-Shu or "True Sect," the most vigorous and wealthy of the Buddhist sects in Japan. The historical Buddhism of Gotama, of the Sâkya clan, has disappeared. The crowd of other Buddhas who had become competitors for the homage of the faithful, is dispersed. Shin-ran forbade all worship to any but Amida. The laborious and difficult exertions of self-conquest were abandoned. Thankful remembrance of the mercies of Amida summed up the teaching (the Law, Dharma). As the creed of Shonin (ob. 1473) expressed it two centuries later: "Rejecting all religious austerities and all other action, giving up all idea of self-power, we rely upon Amida Buddha with the whole heart for our salvation, . . . believing that at the moment of putting our faith in Amida Buddha our salvation is settled. From that moment the invocation of his name is observed as an expression of thankfulness for Buddha's mercy. Moreover, being thankful for the reception of this doctrine from the founder and succeeding chief-priests, whose teachings were so benevolent and as welcome as light in a dark night, we must also keep the laws which are fixed for our duty during our whole life.'' There is no Antinomianism here. But the Shin-Shu teaching approaches closely to Christian Evangelicalism (as contrasted with the sect of the Pure Land) by declaring that the advent of Amida to the believer is not postponed till death; it is present and immediate. In this life he receives the assurance of his salvation. In other words, the Buddha dwells in his heart by faith, and in lowly reliance on his mercy he is already one with his heavenly Lord. It is for that reason that he may worship no other; and for the same cause all prayer for temporal blessings is forbidden. No charms or spells may be employed to avert evil. Calamity has its root in the misdeeds of a past birth; the moral order cannot be turned aside by the possession of a talisman. No help may be sought from Amida save for spiritual deliverance. "There is no miracle," says a Shin-Shu writer, "so great as that oft-recurring one that those who are so sinful can become Buddha by a single thought of relying upon Amitâbha." The modern Shin-Shu tract might have come straight from some Evangelical depôt. A little boy of pious parents lies dying at the age of eight. His weeping relatives stand beside the bed. "Do not weep," says the child, "I shall soon be with Amida in paradise, and there I shall wait for you. Tell my brother to be a good boy; I want him to be with us there." The unbelieving doctor is, of course, immediately converted, and joins the True Sect. Do you think this is a parody? It is perfectly serious, though it may conceivably be a copy. Here, however, is a brief chant from the Buddhist hymnal, whose pedigree goes back to the thirteenth century:—

Shoreless is the sea of misery caused by birth and death,
And we for a long time were sunk beneath its waves:
But Amida, taking us into the ship of his great mercy,
By that, all alone, carries us across safely.
Moreover, the great mercy of Amida's prayer,
That resides in the ship of the Great Vow,
When we were tossing on the sea of birth and death,
Puts forth his pity, and takes us on board.

So the original "ethical culture" of the historical Gotama has been converted into a kind of Unitarian Evangelicalism from which the first Founder has been entirely eliminated; yet the central conception of deliverance from sin and suffering remains unchanged.

VI.

And we are still face to face with the same problem. Around us are dim masses of our people whom the great principles of religion, as we understand them, never touch. I will not disguise from you that the task of the teacher of to-day is weighted with difficulty. The fields of historical inquiry are enormous: the pathways of religious philosophy are intricate: the social phenomena whose study will (I am convinced) demand more and more of your energy, are infinitely complex: and you may well be bewildered at the magnitude of the tasks which await you. Be not impatient. It is not God's method to set us short and easy ways to the truth, the righteousness, the love, wherein lie salvation. Do not, however, expect from this College more than it can give. It can open to you the sources of knowledge: it can suggest to you wise modes of learning: it may help you to shape the word which the Spirit plants within your soul. But there is no school of prophecy except life: and the key to life lies in the service of others. The historic study of religion may be one form of that service. That is its only justification: that makes it a high calling: and in the present state of our religious world I hold it to be a necessary one—for some. It needs noble gifts, courage and industry, the clear unprejudiced eye, the trained judgment, the heart of lowliness and trust. It may be a means of life. In the broad sense it is in large measure the spring of that revival of the fundamental ideas of Jesus which, in spite of frequent lapses and discouragements, has been slowly going on among us for a whole generation. You have only to look at one of the great creations of modern Christianity, the Salvation Army, to realise what vital power the Gospel aim "to seek and to save that which was lost" may still possess. I may be told that its theology is crude, that its foundation-doctrine of an eternal hell is a ghastly slander on the Father's love, that its discipline is autocratic and tyrannical, that its methods are sometimes childish and its results uncertain. Make what deductions you please; you will still (I think) have to admit that through thousands of its devoted officers the Spirit of God has brought new life to the degraded and the fallen. Were any testimony needed to the power of personality in religion—the splendid and supporting lesson of historical study—you would find it here before your very eyes. It is part of a great divine law, it would seem, that the churches which do not care about saving others shall have considerable difficulty in saving themselves. Hitherto liberal theology has had so much to do in pleading its own justification, it has had so hard a task to secure any kind of recognition that it has had little energy to spare for other duties. That day, thank God, is going by—nay, gone. But liberal theology will exercise no vital force till it has become something more than the interest of the student, and issues from collegiate retreats, or solitary churches, as Channing sent it forth more than two generations ago, charged with a message for the regeneration of man. Wide is the field of human life, gigantic the forces that are arrayed upon it. But, as Emerson somewhere said, "Thoughts rule the world," and the greatest of thoughts, embodied in the immense social conception of "the kingdom of God," and summed up in the command, "Be ye perfect as your Father which is in heaven is perfect," are acquiring fresh vigour as they receive new interpretation on a scale such as Jesus himself could never have conceived. Reserve, then, some weekly hours for refreshment and quickening through the lives of those who in our own day have striven to carry into different spheres of action the spirit of Christ. Shall I name three which have recently come within my reach? James Legge, missionary and teacher; Father Dolling, ritualist slum priest; William Rathbone, merchant and legislator. Remember that you are vowed to the service of man. The way to that service lies for the present through the college class, through the moral and intellectual demands of your studies, through the steadfast cultivation of those habits of body and mind, of heart and will, which alone can give you the mastery over yourselves and your work. I do not invite you, then, to leisured learning or to ways of ease. I call for strenuous effort and laborious days. I bid you remember that your years here are a trust committed to you by God, who is the Author of your being, and by this College, which gives you the means to follow the special way of service you have chosen. Be not disheartened that your numbers are few, that the technicalities of study are sometimes dull, that you cannot have new ideas with which to make a new heaven and a new earth every day. These are the fallacies of undisciplined expectation. Turn your eyes to the high ideal inscribed over the portal of this building. Look up, in your hours of weariness or languor to Truth, to Liberty, and to Religion, and you will know that in their fellowship you need never want for strength or joy.

There was a large attendance at Manchester College on Tuesday, at the opening of the session, when Mr. Carpenter gave the above address. The Master of Balliol, who is one of the Visitors of the College, was among those who were present, and afterwards dined in Hall.

The session opens with the following students:—

Second Years: Messrs. Stanley Mellor, B.A., F. Sinclaire, M.A., W. E. Williams, B.A., Felix Holt, B.A., and A. E. Christian, B.A.

First Year: Messrs. M. Row, B.A., R. K. Davies, B.A., and B. J. Hall. B.A.

Special Students: Messrs. J. C. Ballantyne, R. N. Cross, M.A, and Charles Raffay (Hungarian).

There are also six external students working for graduation, prior to entering on the theological course.

THE REV. WILLIAM NAPIER'S JUBILEE.

THE Rev. William Napier, of Clough, having completed fifty years of service in the ministry, a meeting was held on Saturday, October 14, in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, Belfast, for the presentation of a congratulatory address and a gift of £786, subscribed by a large number of friends not only in the North of Ireland but in this country and Scotland. The Right Hon. Thomas Andrews presided, and the meeting opened with prayer offered by the Rev. Douglas Walmsley. The presentation was made by Mr. John Rogers, and among those who spoke, in addition to the chairman, was Principal Gordon.

The following is the text of the Address, with Mr. Napier's reply.

TO THE REV. WILLIAM NAPIER.

Reverend and Dear Sir,—It is with feelings of deep respect, warm admiration, and strong regard that many friends, far and near, greet the fiftieth anniversary of your Ordination as a Minister of Christ's Holy Gospel.

While, in your preparation for the work of your life, you enjoyed the advantages of study in the College, then at Manchester, rendered illustrious by the names of your teachers, Kenrick, Martineau, Tayler, Vance-Smith, Eddowes-Bowman, Gaskell, Robberds, and Finlay, yet the whole of your active ministry has been devoted to the services of the Church of your fathers in your native land, thus happily illustrating the theme of your early college oration on "The True Scope and End of Education."

From the day when the Remonstrant Presbytery of Bangor having licensed you to preach the Gospel on 29th August, 1854, and the Presbytery of Templepatrick ordained you at Newtown Limavady, on Thursday, 27th September, 1855, your fifty years of faithful duty have been years of deepening hold on the affections of our people, and of steady and ripened influence in the counsels of our Church.

Installed at Ballymoney by Templepatrick Presbytery in 1864, after a few years the kindred Presbytery of Antrim claimed you, installing you at Clough in November, 1867. Here, for well nigh eight-and-thirty years, you have laboured with vigour and freshness, unabated by the lapse of time. Long may the good providence of Him on whose Fatherly care and love, by word and by example, you have taught others to rely, preserve you in health and strength to witness to the truth of His teachings through His beloved Son.

With the members of your own attached flock unite, in this cordial Address, representatives of your old fellow-students, of your brethren in the Ministry, to whom you have been as a father, and of other friends who know and honour your worth.

They beg your acceptance of the accompanying gift. It has been heartily contributed, and is laden with all good wishes for your welfare, and for the tranquil happiness of your continuing days.

THOMAS ANDREWS, Chairman.
JOHN ROGERS, Treasurer.
JOS. HY. BIBBY, Secretary.
October 5, 1905.

REPLY.

My Dear Friends,—We are told on the highest authority that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," but there are occasions—and the present is such an occasion—when the tongue fails adequately to express the feelings of the heart. Your kind and too appreciative Address touches me so deeply as almost to paralyse the power of speech, and, accompanied as it is with your splendid gift, renders a suitable acknowledgment difficult indeed, yet I thank you for both with all my heart.

When the movement which has culminated in the proceedings of this day came to my knowledge I said within myself "who and what am I that this great honour should be conferred on me?" but no satisfactory answer occurred to me. It is true, as stated in your beautiful Address, that I enjoyed the inestimable advantage of studying, with a view to the Christian ministry, at Manchester New College, under the eminent men whose names you mention, and for whose memory I cherish the most grateful respect. It is true also that, ordained to the ministry of the Gospel in 1855, I have been spared by the good providence of God to labour in our corner of the vineyard of His Son for the long period of fifty years with such strength and efficiency as have been vouchsafed to me. I would that I could say and feel that during all these years I have succeeded in attaining to the object of my early ambition—namely, to be a good minister of the Lord Jesus Christ. But conscience forbids me to indulge in such self-flattery, or to receive without large abatement the generous language in which you describe my ministerial character and life.

That, however, I should have discharged the duties of the pastoral office in three congregations with reasonable acceptance and without the slightest friction or shadow of discord rising up between minister and people; that in my intercourse with other congregations I should have found so many friends; that my slender contributions to the wisdom of our deliberative assemblies should have been recognised as it has been both by ministers and laymen; and that my old surviving fellow students as well as many kind friends, who are not of our fold, should have united in this testimony of affectionate goodwill towards me, while it is an indication that ministerial life has not been altogether barren and unfruitful fills my heart with joy unspeakable, and calls forth all the gratitude of which I am capable.

I reciprocate, dear friends, to the fullest extent your good wishes for the peace and tranquillity of my remaining years, some of which, I trust may be spent in active duty and the service of our Divine Master; and I commend you all to the care and blessing of the Great Father of His people, and would say, in the words of one of His greatest servants, "Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within they palaces. For my brethren and companions' sake I will now say peace be within thee."

WILLIAM NAPIER.

THE CARE OF THE INSANE.

SCOTLAND.

A SHORT time ago, in the House of Commons, a Scottish member declared that England was forty years behind Scotland. In the treatment of her insane poor the saying could be amply justified. Not only is England behind the other great European Powers in this respect, but she is behind Scotland. It is, indeed, somewhat difficult for the ordinary citizen to realise that in the treatment of a pressingly important social problem, one small portion of the United Kingdom should have advanced so far beyond the rest. Many of us are apt to suppose that the United Kingdom is more homogeneous than it really is.

In the treatment of her insane poor Scotland's comparative poverty proved a blessing in disguise, for, it may be doubted, whether, if her resources for erecting costly asylums had been less limited, she would have embarked upon what was thought to be the hazardous experiment of boarding patients out. The experiment has amply justified itself, but it was made through necessity, and made when, to quote Sir John Sibbald, "It was a widespread belief that the best place for every insane patient was a well-managed asylum." This was the prevalent belief in Scotland, as it still is in England, when the Lunacy Act (Scotland) of 1857 became law. This Act was due to the Report of a Commission appointed in 1855 to inquire into the state of lunatics and lunatic asylums in Scotland. It created a "General Board of Commissioners in Lunacy" to deal with insanity, taking the place, in this respect, of "The Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor," since known as "The Local Government Board for Scotland." Recognising the fact that many years must elapse before sufficient asylums could be built for all the insane poor in Scotland, the Commissioners turned to the boarding-out system, and made a careful study of it, as then practised at Gheel, in Belgium, where, it will be remembered, the Communal Government had recently, in 1856, appointed Dr. Bulkens, as medical superintendent, to take charge of the colony. This investigation and years of slowly garnered experience, induced the Board entirely to change its conviction "that the best place for every insane patient was a well-managed asylum," and to arrive at the "opinion, which the Board has never seen reason to change, that under efficiently organised supervision, the boarding of a considerable number of patients in private dwellings ought to form an integral part of any complete system of providing for the insane." That the facts, after nearly half a century, abundantly support this opinion will be apparent to all who take the trouble to examine them, and while, briefly touching upon these, I would strongly recommend to all who wish to pursue the subject further, an examination of the "Report on the Care of the Insane Poor, by our Special Commissioner," published in the columns of the British Medical Journal in the first half of this year. To this report, and, I may add, to the interesting conversation of the "Special Commissioner," I am indebted for the facts stated in this article.

Of the 14,309 persons in receipt of relief reported in January, 1904, 19 per cent. were under family care, either in their own dwellings, or boarded out in private dwellings with strangers. Now, in considering the recoveries it must be remembered that what are regarded as the most suitable cases for boarding-out treatment are not the most hopeful cases, but rather the reverse. Many of them are indeed incurable, and yet, despite this act, the recoveries recorded in 1903 reached the high figure of 9 per cent. of the patients under family care, and the death-rate amongst them was less than half that recorded in the closed asylums. One woman after being in a closed asylum for six years recovered within ten months after receiving family care treatment. Facts like these are sufficient not only to justify the system, but to convict a community which refuses to try it of careless apathy or criminal ignorance.

Coming to the financial side of the problem, it will surely be admitted that the most humane system, the system most in accord with nature's requirements, and the system which yields the largest percentage of recovery, must be the most economical in the end. Even if the family care system involved a larger outlay than that of the closed asylum, it would, with these merits, be justified by a true economy. As a matter of fact, it is, not only in the long run, but immediately the less costly system of the two. In the case of Scotland, as we have seen, it was the inability to immediately erect a sufficient number of closed asylums which forced it upon the attention of the Board, and there can be no doubt that the facility with which large sums have been provided by the long-suffering ratepayer in England for the erection and maintenance of these huge institutions has delayed the progress of reform in this country.

The cost per patient in the boarding-out or family care system is in Scotland 8s. 5d., compared with 9s. 11d., in the closed asylums there. That is to say there is a saving of 1s. 6d. per week on every patient. A large sum yearly, when multiplied by 2,658, the number of family care patients in Scotland.

But this is not the only saving. It takes no account of the initial cost and maintenance of the buildings which would otherwise be necessary, and which would amount to a large sum, the repairs alone forming a costly item. To add to this we have another fruitful economy. The useful work these patients do upon the farms must not be left out of consideration. It is work twice blessed, benefiting both the patients themselves and those who care for them. How this is appreciated by the farmers is well illustrated by the caustic saying of one of their number. He said, "He had to pay dafter men than them he was paid for keeping." The Special Commissioner of the British Medical Journal points to whole villages in Fifeshire, formerly seats of hand-loom weaving, which, in the decay of that industry, have been saved from extinction by the settlement of patients in their district.

When will England learn of Scotland, if not of Belgium, that a large proportion of her insane poor might, by a more really humane and intelligent treatment, become to their own advantage, and the advantage of the community, producers of wealth instead of only a grievous burden to society?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

London: Hackney (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting was held at the New Gravel Pit Church on Friday evening, October 13, to welcome the Rev. Henry Rawlings, M.A., as minister of the church. Before the meeting a reception was held by Mr. and Mrs. Rawlings in the schoolroom. There was a very good attendance of members of the congregation and friends who had come from all parts of London to join in the welcome. The Mayor of Hackney, who had promised to attend, wrote with great regret that indisposition kept him at home. A letter from the Rev. T. L. Marshall, a former minister, fifty years ago, was also read, with greetings to old friends. Mr. F. D. Bowles, C.C., who presided, referred to the great traditions of their church, and the long succession of ministers from 1668 onwards, and on behalf of the congregation offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Rawlings. The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed followed with some interesting reminiscences of former ministers, of Robert and Brooke Aspland and Dr. Sadler and their successors, and said that it was with the utmost pleasure he joined in that welcome to his friends, Mr. and Mrs. Rawlings, formerly his fellow-workers at Little Portland-street. He recalled a saying of Dr. Sadler's with reference to the vigorous liberals of former days. "We always know that our ancestors are dead, but we do not always realise that they were not dead, when they were alive." With regard to the work to be done in that church, they ought not to talk of failure or discouragements. Mr. C. F. Pearson, as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, joined cordially in the welcome, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, having referred to the deep interest and the great needs of ministry in London, said that a minister cannot do much alone, but must have the heartfelt sympathy and never wearying support of his congregation. They could not look out upon the bewildering life of London, with its multitudinous problems and perplexities, without wondering what would come of it all. But the eternal principles of religion could not fail, and till those principles of justice, love, and righteousness—love to God and man—permeated the minds and hearts of men, filling them with a passion for service, and lifting them with reverence into a larger brotherhood, the problems of life would never be solved. They must do all they could in that church to draw their own forces together. Mr. H. Epps, as President of the London District Unitarian Society, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on behalf the London ministers, and the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, to whom Mr. Rawlings succeeds, having added their words of sympathy and welcome, the choir sang an anthem, "Oh, for a closer walk with God," after which the Rev. Henry Rawlings responded. He expressed his gratitude to all who had come to join in that welcome to him and his wife. When he thought of standing in that pulpit, he said, he was strangely moved, for that was the first Unitarian church he had entered, when Mr. Whitehead was minister. He had no belief in failure there, and was not discouraged by small numbers. He was confident of the support of the congregation. The Rev. Henry Harries, of the Clapton Park Congregational Church, then offered his earnest good wishes to Mr. Rawlings. That was the first time he had been asked to a Unitarian meeting, and when the invitation came, he accepted at once. They would not suppose on that account that he was being false to his own convictions, but he recognised that their aims and his were one, the promotion of those principles for which Jesus Christ lived and died. He honoured from the depth of his heart, honesty of conviction; it was the duty of everyone to follow his own best thought, and he recognised that Unitarians did that. He did not know Mr. Rawlings personally, but he had known the late Alfred Payne at Stockport, and he recalled the memory of his old Principal at Carmarthen College, Stephen Hunter, one of the best and devoutest men he had ever known. If Mr. Rawlings was like those two, he welcomed him very heartily. He had sat at the feet of Martineau and Channing, and had met Armstrong; they were to him brothers beloved, fathers in God; as he read their words he forgot they were Unitarians. If like them Mr. Rawlings preached the Fatherhood of God and the infinite preciousness of the human soul, he offered him a hearty welcome. The Rev. F. G. Benskin, of the Downs Baptist Church, who had known Mr. Rawlings in old days at Huddersfield, endorsed all that Mr. Harries had said, and joined cordially in the welcome. It was not echoes they needed in the present day, he said, but voices; voices for the Eternal, for the principles of righteousness, truth and peace. Mr. Rawlings stood as they did for spirituality, seeking for the higher life; in that and in all efforts for civic righteousness he wished him God speed. Dr. Blyth, the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and S. Farrington having added their good wishes, a closing hymn was sung and Mr. Rawlings pronounced the Benediction.

London: Acton (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting was held by the Unitarian congregation on Wednesday evening, Oct. 11, to welcome the Rev. Arthur Hurn, the newly-appointed minister. Mr. Hurn had been for three years a student in the Richmond Wesleyan College, under Dr. Agar Beet, but through change of religious conviction was unable to enter the Wesleyan ministry. The meeting was held in the auction room of Mr. Bridger Athawes, the temporary home of the congregation until a church is built on the site which has been secured. Dr. Herbert Smith presided, and among those who joined in the welcome were the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and W. G. Tarrant. The Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, Felix Taylor and Forbes Fletcher were also present. Mr. Hurn gratefully acknowledged the welcome accorded to him, and urged the necessity of earnest work upon the congregation, if they were to make the gospel they had to preach really effectual.

Southend-on-Sea (Appointment).—Mr. Delta Evans, of London, has accepted a cordial and unanimous invitation to take the oversight of the church at Southend, and he hopes to commence his duties on the first Sunday in November.

Southport.—The anniversary services of the Portland-street Unitarian Church were conducted on Sunday, Oct. 8, by Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, and on Monday evening a tea meeting, followed by a public meeting, was held in the school-room. The Rev. F. B. Mott presided, and in opening the proceedings said that Unitarianism should be aggressive and affirmative. There should be a building work instead of a demolishing work. They had a great, grand, glorious new religious truth to herald. Their work was revolutionary. The Unitarian attitude and thought was something that the world had never seen, and was still waiting to receive. On the whole they had had a satisfactory year of work, but had to regret the departure of several friends from the town. Mr. A. S. Thew proposed and Mr. C. E. Hudson seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Roberts for his services on the previous day, and to the Revs. J. C. Odgers and H. W. Hawkes, who were to address them that evening. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, in responding, spoke of the work of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, out of which that congregation had its origin in 1862, and very speedily attained to independence, and became a supporter of the Association. To their present work at Garston and St. Helen's they hoped in the new year to add a new effort at West Kirby and Hoylake, and he asked for their practical support. The Rev. J. Collins Odger spoke of the virtues of the Japanese and the similarities between Buddhism and Christianity, dwelling in conclusion on the optimism of the latter faith, which pressed ever forward to fuller life. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes referred to the Geneva Conference and the stimulus derived from it. But with the wider outlook they must remember their immediate duty of fidelity at home in each individual unit of the great army. In the interval after tea an organ recital was given by Mrs. Campbell in the chapel.

Yorkshire Unitarian S.S. Union.—A conference was held last Saturday at the Mill-hill school, Leeds, when delegates and teachers to the number of sixty-four were present from the schools at Mill-hill, Holbeck, Hunslet, Pudsey, Bradford, Halifax, Dewsbury, Rotherham and Lydgate. After tea, the conference opened with a hymn, and the president, Mr. E. O. Dodgson, gave an interesting address bearing upon the question of religious education. The Rev. Henry Cross, of Dewsbury, then read a paper on "The Problem of the Non-teaching Teacher." Half of the teachers in our schools, he said, do not teach—not because they do not try but because they cannot. Hence the problem, which was not to be solved by preparation classes, handbooks, &c., but by a reorganisation of the school. The teacher who could teach was one who had a consciousness of personal religion and was able to make the scholar feel the relation of all things to the mystic life within the veil. Rationalism was inadequate. The teacher must be evangelical and have the power of suasion. The system of classes must cease. Scholars must be grouped into senior and junior sections. Three or four teachers in a school could alternately teach such groups, while the other teachers should act as pastors, attend to visiting and superintending the scholars in smaller groups. This was the form of Sunday-school work that had come to be imperative. The Sunday-school of the future would be of this type. The paper provoked an unusually earnest discussion, in which the Revs. C. Hargrove, W. R. Shanks, and J. Ellis, and a large number of the teachers joined, mainly in favour of the existing system. The Rev. H. Cross replied, and the meeting was brought to a close.

STORIES OF THE Early Italian Masters.

BY KATHARINE F. LAWFORD.

With Fifteen Full-page Illustrations.

Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Presentation Edition, gilt edges, 2s. net. Postage 3d.

The Spectator says: "It is an attempt to kindle in young readers a love for Italian Art, and so gain for them a possession of inexhaustible richness."

The Academy says: "That children should be made familiar with good art, even in the nursery, is an axiom no one will now deny, though it is only of late years that it has been at all generally recognised. The little volume just issued with its taking title is certainly a step in the right direction. . . . The stories are told in a simple, straightforward manner, and the illustrations are well chosen."

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

Chairman.—Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

Vice-Chairman.—Mr. G. H. LEIGH.

THE Mission Committee appeal to the generosity of friends of religious work among the poor.

They have been obliged to decide upon the extension of their premises at Willert-street and Renshaw-street on account of the constantly increasing work at the two Missions. They propose to enlarge the buildings at Willert-street at a cost of about £1,200 (the necessary land has been bought), and those at Renshaw-street at a cost of about £1,500 (part of this scheme has already been completed).

Owing to the increasing demands upon the funds of the society, and the loss of old and generous friends and subscribers, there is an annual deficit of more than £150. The Committee wish to pay off the existing debt, and to provide a sum for future needs. For these objects they require at least £3,500.

They acknowledge with gratitude the following donations:—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association met on Wednesday afternoon at Essex Hall, when an elaborate report of the work done by the Association, both at home and abroad, was presented by the Committee. This we shall publish next week, with an account of the meeting. Miss Westenholz, one of the Danish correspondents of the Association, who was passing through London, was present, and received a cordial welcome. The following were among the resolutions passed :—

"That the members of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association send to Professor Montet and the local Committee their warm congratulations on the success which attended the recent meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers at Geneva, and an expression of their sincere gratitude for the notable service rendered by the meetings to the cause of liberal religion in many lands."

"That the members of the Council have learned with great interest and pleasure that the American Unitarian Association have invited the International Council to hold its next series of meetings in Boston in 1907, and they desire to assure Dr. Samuel A. Eliot and his fellow-workers of the hearty sympathy of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in the effort to make the meetings in America another memorable landmark in the history of a free and progressive religious faith."

THE Nelson Centenary was celebrated last Saturday with great enthusiasm, notably in Trafalgar-square and the great gatherings in the Albert Hall. On Sunday afternoon, at the commemorative service in St. Paul's Cathedral, a striking sermon was preached by Dr. Gordon Lang, the Bishop of Stepney. The text was from Ps. civ. 4, "He maketh his angels spirits: and his ministers a flaming fire." That referred, said the preacher, to the flaming fires of zeal, and in the ranks of the men who had burned their way through the world stood the great sailor whom they were that day commemorating. The spirit of Nelson was essentially a flaming fire. He had great gifts in plenty—calmness, decision, generosity, affection—and all these were kindled by the heat of his soul into a single heroic fire, and it was this that God used a hundred years ago to determine the fate of Great Britain and of the world. That was the Nelson who lived. There was a Nelson who died, who was subject to an infatuation—but he was put away, withdrawn from sight—in the hands of God, who in judgment remembers mercy. They did not want to remember him. The Nelson who lived was the heroic spirit that burnt its way through and above the failings of mortal flesh. It was the essential spirit, the spirit of the man at his best, that lived. In him tenacity of purpose, wealth of patriotic affection, devotion to duty grew into a single fire. Even his foes to-day did honour to his memory, shared with us the heritage of his fame. The Nelson we celebrated to-day was simply the spirit of a virtue which every nation would wish its citizens to have—patriotism raised by the fire and zeal to a heroic height.

AT the conclusion of his sermon (we quote from the summary in the Guardian), the Bishop asked his hearers to lay deep in their souls the lessons of Nelson's life and death, so that, triumphing over modern apathy and emotionalism, a new fire might run through the veins of the English people. Fulness of bread, softness of living, undue luxury and comfort—these things were making the national spirit limp and slack. Could we acquiesce in the East-end of London as a permanent production of our civilisation? The country still needed help, but in helping we must set our faces against lust, gambling, drink, dishonesty in trade, reckless finance, growth of pauperism, decline in our birth-rate, poverty and squalor in our towns and villages. They must face all these as Nelson faced the fleet when it came before him—with the courage of conviction that God meant victory to be obtained. We need a set determination to make things better; to give to the old country the ministry of a flaming fire.

SERMONS on Nelson were naturally preached in many churches throughout the country last Sunday. As examples of those preached in our own churches we may mention the Rev. R. B. Drummond's at St. Mark's, Edinburgh, and the Rev. Henry Gow's at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead. Nelson, said Mr. Drummond, stood alone and unrivalled as the greatest of naval commanders. Had he only gained victories for his nation, he would have been loaded with honours. But besides this his personal qualities endeared him to the hearts of his countrymen. He possessed all the best characteristics of the British seaman—his manly simplicity, his reckless daring, his genuine good nature and kindness of heart. In that feeble and sickly frame, sadly mutilated as it was in his later years, there burned an indomitable spirit, which was only kindled into new ardour by the presence of danger and the sound of battle. For all these reasons he was the darling of his nation while he lived, almost their idol at his death, and their ideal hero for ever.

MR. Gow also, preaching on Sunday morning in Rosslyn-hill Chapel, spoke of the deep affection and honour in which Nelson was held. "It has been given to few public men in our history to captivate and to retain so completely not only the admiration and gratitude, but what might without exaggeration be described as the love of his fellow-countrymen." Cromwell was a greater and a better man, but does not so appeal to the imagination or touch the heart of the nation A daring, fearless, affectionate, simple-minded, generous sailor, with wonderful powers of managing men, and with the instinct for doing the right thing in the great crises of battle, such was Nelson, and Mr. Gow noted three qualities in particular which in him appealed to our admiration and affection: his intense desire for honour (to do some great thing for his country), his daring readiness, and even delight, in attempting what seemed almost impossible, and his belief in human nature. He believed that men would do their duty, and be ready for self-sacrifice as he was, and they rose to his appeal.

THE National Union of Women Workers has been meeting in Birmingham this week. On Tuesday a paper by Mrs. Humphry Ward on "Vacation Schools" was read by her daughter. The origin of this happy effort to meet the needs of city children was thus indicated:—Vacation schools are an American institution, inaugurated in 1893. The first in England was that at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in London, in 1902, and it succeeded at once, and beyond all hope. London in the summer just gone, had half a dozen such schools, and the daily average attendance at that in Tavistock-place was 930. The object of the schools was to give the children as good a time as possible, and to find out and encourage their special tastes, and the curriculum—arranged for two and a-half hours each day—included such varieties as dancing, the singing of old English songs, story telling, bubble-blowing, and sand-digging. The cost of the Settlement School this year was 1s. 6d. per child per week. Other papers on the same subject were read, one by Mr. J. W. Rider on the Hereford Vacation School, and another by Mrs. C. W. Kimmins, telling of the good work done in London by the Guild of Brave Poor Things and the Guild of Play. Much original thought is elicited by these schools. One example cited was this definition of a nettle by a little girl: "A sneaking green grass what nips your bare legs."

It is in the nature of conferences to afford only the most limited opportunity for conferring. In fact, this peculiarity is one of the most curious minor instances of the hurrying spirit of the present day. All things are worth discussing and few worth discussing thoroughly; unless, indeed, there should be some questions which we are always raising which might now be left at rest, so that with more leisure we might get to the root of things about which we are still in doubt. But, anyway, a recent conference at Leeds on the Institutional Church was no exception to the general rule. The reader of the paper, Mr. Blackshaw, himself the head of a flourishing institutional church or church settlement at Sheffield, was so circumscribed in his reply that he supplements it with a letter to the press. And a silent member of the conference writes a letter in which he probes deep into the problem which this Institutional is intended to deal with.

Mr. Swan points out that the church, acting along the present fashionable lines, can do nothing radical for social well-being. The institutional church is a palliative, not a remedy. Good for individuals, but no more. In spite of these and other efforts of the churches, "the great diseases of the social body are still destroying some of its best life. . . . . Now, with deeper thought by the church, we shall come nearer to solving the social problems. It is the work not of churches but of the whole community. . . . . It is through the municipality, or civic church (we like these three words), and through Parliament inspired by Jesus, that the people will be socially and morally saved."

In Tuesday's Times (Oct. 24) appeared a letter from Mr. Frank Johnson, editor of the Sunday School Chronicle, which tells its own tale:—"An advertisement appeared in The Times a few days ago of a house to be let in a town 32 miles north-west of London. Last Wednesday I travelled down to the place—after receiving from the landlord answers to a few queries—examined the house, and found it satisfactory. The landlord was the vicar of the parish, and on interviewing him we proceeded to settle the terms of the tenancy. Just before these were concluded he said, 'I presume you are a Churchman.' 'No,' I replied, 'I am a Nonconformist.' 'Then,' said he, 'I could not let you have the house!'

"The question and the decision were startling reminders of things as they are, and for the first time in my life I realised the full significance of the term 'Dissenter.' As the editor of a religious weekly with a large circulation among all denominations, it has been my privilege to do something to promote Christian unity, but this experience shows how difficult of attainment that ideal is. The spirit of this vicar, but slightly extended, would deprive Nonconformists of the necessaries of life and utterly wreck all civic and social relationships.

"As I write this over my own name and with no personal bitterness, I may be allowed to state that the town referred to was Hitchin and the vicar the Rev. George Gainsford."

The Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, sends us the following note:—"In the Literary Guide and Rationalist Review, for the present month (October), there is a paragraph referring to my articles on 'The Omissions of Rationalism,' which have recently appeared in the Inquirer. The writer charges me with being blind to the whole drift of Rationalist teaching; he says:—'If we dethrone the lord of heaven and destroy love and reverence for the gods, we put in their place love of mankind, and a passion for the service of others.' He further says 'Have we not sat at the feet of Herbert Spencer, who in his "Principles of Ethics" traces the growth of sympathy and the moral sentiments, and shows that these things lie at the root of human progress.' The writer also refers to Auguste Comte and George Eliot. But as I explicitly stated that I was referring to a certain well-known group of living writers who have assumed the title of 'Rationalists,' all this is no defence, as I myself quoted Herbert Spencer and other Agnostics to justify my own criticism. It would have been more to the point if the writer in the Literary Guide had shown that the writers to whom I referred had been able to show from their own books that they had the broad and sympathetic spirit which was manifested by Herbert Spencer and George Eliot. It was the noticeable absence of this spirit which led me to write as I did."

The Expository Times has entered with the October number on its seventeenth year. It began as a threepenny magazine of twenty-four pages, but at the beginning of the third year, size and price were doubled and the circulation at once more than doubled. The editor is Dr. James Hastings, who has achieved so great a work in the completion of his "Dictionary of the Bible" with its fifth supplementary volume. The Expository Times is of constant interest, and full of information as to recent theological literature.

The Netherlands Protestantenbond, which is to hold its annual meeting at Bussum, near Amsterdam, next week, is publishing an admirable series of religious handbooks. The first of the series, published early in 1902, by Professor H. Oort, of Leiden, on "Our Life in God," is already in a third edition. Next came an essay on "Our Moral and Religious Life," by a Baptist minister, the Rev. P. B. Westerdijk, and another on "Believing and Knowing," by Dr. C. J. Niemeijer, secretary of the Protestantenbond. The fourth of the series, by Professor A. Bruining, of Amsterdam, on "The Survival of Human Personality after Death," first published in October, 1904, quickly reached a second edition. This year two little books have been published, one by Professor Knappert, of Leiden, on "Our Religious Instruction, in connection with the bringing up of our Children," the other, a second contribution to the series by Professor Oort on "The Sermon on the Mount."

The October number of "Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift" completes the third volume of this quarterly (published by de Erven Loosjes at Haarlem). It consists of two solid articles, occupying together 81 pages, and another 58 pages devoted to reviews of books and the quarter's bibliography. The first article is by Professor W. Brandt, of Amsterdam, on "Theology," giving a sketch of its meaning in Plato and Aristotle and other Greeks and then through the periods of Christian history, noting its changed aspect in the light of modern knowledge, and the significance of the historical study of religions. The second article, by Professor J. C. Matthes on the History of Israel, draws special attention to the mythical element on which so much stress has been laid, as in the case of "Samson," and more recently (by Hugo Winckler) of "Saul."

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" is to be given in Birmingham this autumn, the first lecture on Tuesday next, Oct. 31. Mr. Carpenter will also give two lectures on "The Gospels and How to Read Them" at the following six places:—Bridport, Nov. 2 and 16; Taunton, Nov. 8 and 22; Ilminster, Nov. 9 and 23; Exeter, Nov. 10 and 15; Plymouth, Nov. 29 and Dec. 6; Torquay, Nov. 30 and Dec. 7.

Viscount Hayashi, the Japanese Minister, has sent to the Editor of the Hibbert Journal a message of cordial appreciation of the two articles in the current number of that journal dealing with Japan. To Mr. Jacks's own article, "Is the Moral Supremacy of Christendom in Danger?" we call attention in our leading article this week.

You cannot be so much as honest unless you have the habit of looking at the other man's end of the bargain as well as your own.—S. G. Merriam.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE, M.P., ON UNITARIANISM.

OPENING a Bazaar in the Trowbridge Town Hall, on behalf of the Conegre Chapel on Thursday week, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice gave an interesting address on Unitarianism. Hs referred at the outset to the connection of Dr. Joseph Priestley with his family, since Priestley from 1772 to 1780 had been librarian or literary companion to the second Earl of Shelburne. Having spoken of the origins of Unitarianism in England, in General Baptist, Presbyterian and Church of England sources, Lord Edmond passed to the subject of the burning of Servetus, and repeated an erroneous statement (he said he did not know whether it was a fact or not) that on the expiatory monument erected at Champel in Geneva, the inscription says that the crime was committed by Calvin "contrary to the general feelings of the Protestant world." There is no such statement on the monument, which, on the contrary, speaks of that crime as "an error, which was that of his age."

The concluding part of the address, as reported in the Wiltshire Times, was as follows :—

Could anyone doubt that when their great Protestant martyrs, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, were burnt, there were possibly some people who did not forget that they, too, either by open consent, or by criminal silence, had been consenting parties to that great crime which writers such as Hallam, Gibbon, Lecky, and Mignet, had all joined in pronouncing, both in itself, and in the attendant circumstances, the most wicked of all the crimes of a cruel time. Among the early Protestant leaders, Zwingli, the Swiss reformer, a most noble character, was on the whole prepared to interpret all tenets according to the à priori conceptions of reason and conscience, and to arrive at the logical conclusion that what was wrong or cruel morally, could not be right religiously. But his position was never clearly stated. It was more a matter of inference from his conduct and writings than from any positive statement he ever made; but with the Unitarians the matter was perfectly clear. The Unitarians of the time he was referring to were generally called by the name of the Socinians, a name which stuck to them for long afterwards, and was regarded by many as a term of reproach, whereas it was nothing of the kind. The name was taken from two famous Italians, Lælius Socinus and Faustus Socinus, with whose life and works the doctrines of religious toleration and freedom were intimately associated, in an age when these things were denied by Roman Catholics and Protestants alike. In the great theological contest between Bishop Bossuet and Jurein in the 17th century, the Roman Catholic and the Protestant champions both recognised the fact. Religious toleration (said Jurein) "is a Socinian dogma, and the most dangerous of all the Socinian dogmas, because its tendency is to ruin Christianity and establish universal indifference." "No illusion," says Bossuet, "is so dangerous as that religious toleration is a characteristic of the true Church, and among Christians I only know of the Socinians and Anabaptists as living under it." Therefore out of the mouths of their enemies it could be convincingly proved that the Socinians of that time and the Unitarians of to-day were the persons who advocated religious toleration, and it was even more important to bear in mind that what was asserted in theory was put into practice. Not only were they the first to assert these doctrines, but it was their especial glory that they had suffered for them.

The last martyrs to religious oppression in England were two people of the name of Wightman and Bartholomew Legate, who were burnt in 1612 as heretics. There was no doubt at all that Legate was a follower of the Socini, and it appeared exceedingly likely that Wightman was also. These two men sealed by their suffering their belief in the great cause of religious liberty, and he could not possibly do better than close his remarks by reading what had been nobly said by a great prelate of the English Church, whose name he quoted at the commencement of his address, viz., Dr. Creighton, the late Bishop of London, who said, speaking of these two terrible crimes, the burning of Wightman and Legate: "It seems strange to us that not a word was uttered against this horrible cruelty. As we read over the brief contemporary notices which have reached us, we look in vain for the slightest intimation that the deaths of these two men were regarded with any other feelings than those with which the writers were accustomed to hear of the execution of an ordinary murderer. If any remark was made, it was in praise of James for the devotion which he showed to the cause of God. Happily, if men of education failed to regard these acts of tyranny in their true light, there was a spirit abroad amongst the common people which warned the King that there was nothing to be gained by a repetition of the experiment which had been tried. When, a few years afterwards, a Spanish Arian was convicted of heresy, he was allowed to linger out the rest of his life in prison. This was bad enough, but it was at least a step in advance. Since the judicial murder of Wightman, no such atrocity has disgraced the soil of England."

AMONG the "Notes and Jottings" of the October Seed Sower we find the following:—"Writing a year ago we were able to announce the approaching advent of the New Hymnal. It is a matter of congratulation that it is ready for the autumn season. We have heard already of some congregations that are ,eager to adopt it, and we hope that many others will be quick to be wise. For it is a good book, and a cheap one. The musical edition has won golden opinions already from many people competent to judge. If it helps gradually to introduce greater uniformity of musical use, and at the same time develops musical taste, one of the chief aims of the promoters will be accomplished. For worship in the home, and the beautiful custom of singing hymns in the family on Sunday evening, it will be a great boon. We venture to advise parents very strongly to procure it, and to use it with their children, even if it is not possible to introduce it at present in the worship of the church."

CITIZEN SUNDAY.

October 29, 1905.

HYMN OF THE CITY.

THE fathers built this city
In ages long ago,
And busy in its busy streets
They hurried to and fro;
The children played around them
And sang the songs of yore—
Till, one by one, they fell asleep,
To work and play no more.

Yet still the city standeth,
A hive of toiling men,
And mother's love makes happy homes
For children now as then;
O God of ages, help us
Such citizens to be,
That children's children here may sing
The songs of liberty.

Let all the people praise thee,
Give all thy saving health,
Or vain the labourer's strong right arm
And vain the merchant's wealth.
Send forth thy light to banish
The shadows and the shame,
Till all the civic virtues shine
Around our city's name.

A commonweal of brothers,
United, great and small,
Upon our banner blazoned be
The Charter, "Each for all!"
Nor let us cease from battle,
Nor weary sheathe the sword,
Until this city is become
The city of the Lord.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

I HAVE among my books of poetry an old volume called "Hymns and Sacred Poems by John Wesley, M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, and Charles Wesley, M.A., Student of Christ Church, Oxford." It is the third edition, published in London in 1756, and it contains the beautiful preface on Christian perfection, and at the end an advertisement of "Books published by the Reverend Mr. John and Charles Wesley." Not even the pages of John Wesley's Journal have such a magical power of transporting the mind into the centre of the Methodist Revival. These verses still glow with rapture and pleading. Sometimes, in their passionate intensity, we are inclined to compare them with Crashaw; but it is their knowledge of the human heart, their insight into the interior life, their desire for the perfect mind of Christ, which strike the reader most. They have many points in common with the great mystics; their burden is continually:

"God delights in man to dwell, Soul of each believing soul," only they have at the same time a sure hold of the central facts of the Christian Revelation, which saves them from mere pantheistic vagueness. Readers who want to realise Charles Wesley's power of using a familiar Biblical incident as the symbol of intense individual experience should read "Come, O thou traveller unknown," not in the truncated form in which it appears in many modern hymn-books, but as a complete poem. As an illustration of his exquisite simplicity and tenderness, what can be better than the first of his Hymns for Children, beginning: "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild"? One verse, perhaps not quite so familiar as some others, I may be forgiven for quoting:

"I shall live the simple life,
Free from sin's uneasy strife,
Sweetly ignorant of ill,
Innocent, and happy still."

Regarded simply from the literary point of view, the hymns of the Wesleys exhibit an extraordinary variety of metrical forms. They seem to have set the cadences which many later hymn-writers were to follow. But they do not sound like experiments in verse. They appeal directly to the ear, and the reader finds himself deriving new pleasure from them when he lets the voice interpret. Like most lyrical poetry, they should be read aloud. In one respect they have suffered a good deal from editors. Not only has many a fine hymn been cut short—this has been necessary to satisfy the taste of modern congregations—but alterations have been introduced with far too free a hand. The literary conscience often suffers from a fit of obtuseness when it is dealing with hymns, and people who are punctilious almost to pedantry about a text in the New Testament, falsify hymns or perpetuate garbled versions with a fine air of indifference. I know that there are arguments quite irreproachable on the low ground of preference and utility. I am only concerned at present to emphasise the pleasure of turning over the leaves of my old book, where everything is as the authors wished it to be. Let those who like to do so praise the versions, which have become familiar to many of us, of the hymn on the mind of Christ; I still prefer it as it was written, with the beautiful refrain: "Jesu's is a Quiet Mind," "Jesu's is an Heavenly Mind," "Jesu's is a Perfect Mind." Many other small alterations have been introduced into some current versions of this hymn, for which I can find no justification, unless it be that the Muses grant the editorial mind a special dispensation from the trammels of accuracy when it is only dealing with hymns.

I suppose the earliest hymn-book, as it is undoubtedly the best, is the Book of Psalms. For some emotions the Psalms are the perfect expression, and we can neither imagine nor desire anything better. But they do not exhaust the range of religious feeling and Christian need. There are the special experiences and the sacred events of Christianity to stir the lyrical impulse. How much we should like to recover the hymn which, as Pliny tells us, the Christians used to sing at daybreak to Christ. "Soliti stato die ante lucem convenire, carmenque Christo, quasi deo, dicere secum invicem," so he wrote to the Emperor Trajan. From that time the voice of religious poetry has been seldom silent in the Church, and at moments of intense feeling it has produced songs of worship, dwelling on the great themes of the Christian faith—the Nativity, the Cross, the Judgment,—or the personal experiences of the redeemed, in rich abundance.

Hymns may be described, however, as chiefly the product of the reformed churches. I do not forget the stately hymns and canticles of the Middle Ages, but very few of them have survived in general use, or possess the popular qualities of Luther's hymns or the German chorales of the century that followed the Reformation. On the other hand, the large movements of revival within the borders of Protestantism have been, for the most part, hymn-singing movements—I need only mention the hymns of the Moravian brethren—and it is in Protestant worship that the hymn has a secure place, where it has obtained almost a symbolical significance, appealing to the ear as the old ritual appealed chiefly to the eye.

Our own time has been singularly productive in hymn-writing, and possibly the causes for it have been at once more various and more diffused than formerly. Popular feeling has sought for simple metrical expression; there has been the quickening of wider thought and fresh religious needs; but, above all, there is the influence of modern music. Many a poor hymn survives on the wings of a good tune. Every good hymn-book must have its musical edition. I have even heard of certain hymns being written to fit a popular tune,—a reversal of the natural order which may easily work a Nemesis in a crop of paltry rhymes masquerading under the name of religious poetry.

In any good modern collection of hymns these various elements will be represented. There will be translations of mediæval hymns. There will be some of the stirring hymns of the Reformation. There will be hymns by great Puritan writers like Milton and Richard Baxter. Watts and Doddridge will represent the sober pieties of the eighteenth century. There will be the best of the hymns of Charles Wesley, with their simple intensity of feeling and their profound insight into religious experience, of which I have spoken already. The Anglo-Catholic writers will be there, Keble, with the delicate refinement of the Christian Year, Newman and Faber. The Church of England spirit will be represented by authors like Lyte, who spent a devoted life in a wild Cornish parish and has left one great hymn to the Church, and John Ellerton. The American transcendentalists will be there, Emerson and Holmes—the famous Autocrat who has left us the two fine hymns: "O Love Divine that stooped to share" and "Lord of all being throned afar"—Samuel Longfellow, brother of the more famous poet, and many another singer of the glories of the indwelling Spirit of God. And, following in their train, a host of others, who, as hymn-writers, belong to no party or school of thought—Sarah Flower Adams, Anna Lætitia Waring, Frances Havergal, Thomas Toke Lynch, Thomas Hornblower Gill, Sir John Bowring, and many more, who have left us religious songs that live in the memory because they speak to the heart.

It is not easy to describe the qualities which go to the making of a good hymn. Many hymns that are in great favour are undoubtedly deficient in literary excellence. It is not unreasonable, however, to demand some beauty of form in words that are to be used in the worship of God, and to attract to themselves some of the most sacred associations of life. Religious feeling that is simple, deep, and sincere, tends always to avoid what is tawdry and vulgar in speech, and to express itself with native grace, if not with the poet's finished art. But, in dealing with hymns, we must discard the moods of the literary epicurean, and have their purpose chiefly in view. Do they enshrine the great historical memories of Christendom? Are they the expression of deeply-felt Christian emotions? Perhaps, above all, we should be careful to ask whether they are alive with the feeling and experience of the people who have used them. It is the hymns that have helped, which we prefer to sing.

A great many recent hymn-books have made the fatal mistake of giving far too much space to new hymns and especially to American hymns. I have no objection to things made in America, or anywhere else, if they are good; but many of these American hymns of the liberal faith are not good hymns at all. They have no note of lyrical passion in them. We sing them because we think we agree with them and they are quite harmless, not because they stir our souls. Some of them are full of theological self-consciousness, as though the writers set themselves to write verses about the superiority of the new faith over the old. Even the lines by Oliver Wendell Holmes,

"Our Father, while our hearts unlearn
The creeds that wrong Thy name," which have found their way into some recent hymn-books, are not free from this blemish. The mood in which we unlearn creeds may be a very good mood indeed, but it is not the mood in which we sing praises to God. I do not doubt that there is a genuine lyrical impulse in the heart of the liberal faith, only I do not hear its authentic voice in the vague and sentimental hymns to which I have referred. It must find strong and virile expression, and keep close to the permanent elements in Christian emotion, if it is to quicken the pulses of men, and, in the beautiful words of Isaac Watts, "become a servant of the Churches and a helper to the joy of the meanest Christian."

W. H. D.

Dr. Howard Bliss, president of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirût, has given some exceedingly interesting information to an Examiner interviewer. The aim of the College, which was started in 1866 by Dr. Bliss's father, is to give a thoroughly modern higher education to young men of many nationalities and any faith. The majority of the 750 students are naturally Syrian, but there are considerable numbers of Armenians, Greeks, &c. And many of the young men go out to take posts in our civil service in Egypt. The religious professions of the students are various, but all are expected to attend the Christian religious exercises of the College. They do attend, and in this instance the "religious difficulty" does not seem to exist. The sight, we are told, "of 700 students, representing ten or a dozen religious beliefs, all gathered together at evening chapel, listening to some simple Gospel message, most of them singing Christian hymns, and all silent and reverent during the prayer, is a soul-stirring spectacle." Truly, such union of men of various opinions in common worship as well as in united intellectual study, does suggest thoughts of that mighty Faith which underlies all faiths.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CENTENARY.

NOTTINGHAM, HIGH PAVEMENT.

WITH remarkable and most refreshing enthusiasm the celebrations commemorating the foundation of the High Pavement Sunday-school in 1805 have been held at Nottingham. This institution occupies a peculiar place in the affections of the city, as well as of our own fellowship. Great preparations had been made for the adequate recognition of the interesting event, and the proceedings were carried through with the utmost heartiness and success. It was early resolved by the Sunday-school committee to strike a handsome bronze medal for distribution among the scholars and teachers of the school, and also to erect a stained-glass window in the chapel, and a memorial tablet in the schools. As an appropriate forerunner of these celebrations the Historical Society held the inaugural meeting of the session on Wednesday the 18th inst., when Mr. J. C. Warren, who is the president of the society, and also one of the superintendents of the school, delivered a lecture on "The History of the High Pavement School." Mr. Warren is a recognised authority on the history of the chapel and its institutions, and his lecture was full of valuable information and interesting reminiscence. He traced the development of the Sunday-school movement in Nottingham from its inception down to 1805, when the High Pavement Sunday-school was founded by the Rev. James Tayler, and thence followed the course of this institution down to the present day. He recalled many happy and humorous incidents in the school, and showed how well it had served the scholars, the church, and the city.

On Friday evening, the 20th inst., the celebrations began with a gathering of old scholars and teachers in the schools. Fully one thousand invitations had been issued and there was a crowded gathering. It was indeed a memorable re-union. Old scholars and teachers, some of them scattered abroad and long separated from each other met once more face to face, and warmed each other into a glow of cordiality as they discussed old times. The whole suite of rooms had been beautifully decorated—the upper part being used for a soirée, and the large lower hall for a meeting at which brief speeches were delivered. The hall was completely filled when Miss Hannah Guilford, the president of the Sunday-school, took the chair, and among those present were representatives of nearly all the old families and the present-day workers connected with the chapel and schools. Leaflets had been printed bearing the portrait of the Rev. James Tayler, the founder of the school, and two hymns —one by Mrs. Wm. Enfield, the other being "Our God, our help in ages past." After the first hymn had been sung, Miss H. Guilford, in a few happy phrases, offered a welcome to all present, and congratulated the school on the attainment of its centenary, and on its celebration by so magnificent a meeting. Other addresses recalling the splendid services of the men and women who had so lovingly laboured in the past, and the noble work which they had done, were delivered by the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, of Dukinfield (a descendant of the founder), the Rev. Wm. Blazeby (a former minister of the High Pavement Chapel), the Rev. Lawrence Scott, who spoke of his connection with the school, and made an impassioned appeal for service in the holy cause of religion; Mr. A. H. Burgess, who has been associated with the school and chapel for nearly 60 years; the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, the present minister, and Mr. J. C. Warren, who has been the moving spirit of the celebrations. Mr. Warren, on behalf of the old teachers and scholars, handed to Miss Guilford a beautiful address on vellum on her retirement from active work as morning superintendent of the girls' department; and on behalf of present scholars and teachers a framed photograph of the school—gifts which Miss Guilford feelingly acknowledged. The meeting concluded with a hymn and a benediction pronounced by the minister. In the upper rooms a short musical programme was rendered, and interesting exhibits of historical relics were displayed. Among these were the register of the first Sunday-school established in Nottingham in 1784; a collection of the earliest anniversary hymns of the Sunday and day schools; the pitch-pipe used by the precentor to set the tune before the introduction of organs; the Bible presented to the school on its foundation; photographs and engravings, and numerous addresses to the "saints" and worthies of the school.

The centenary services, conducted by the Revs. James Harwood and J. M. Lloyd Thomas, were held on Sunday, and attracted crowded congregations. In the morning Mr. Thomas preached from 2 Cor. iii. 11: "For if that which passeth away was with glory much more that which remaineth is in glory." In the evening Mr Harwood preached from 2 Peter iii. 1: "By way of remembrance," and had before him, if not actually a record congregation, certainly the largest that has been seen in the chapel for many years. The ordinary chapel accommodation proved inadequate, and chairs had to be placed in the aisles. Both morning and evening the Centenary Hymn, specially written by the Rev. Dendy Agate was sung. The services were marked with great heartiness and overflowing of feeling, and will not be forgotten by those who attended them. At the close of the service, Mr. Harwood and Mr. Thomas accompanied by Miss Winser and Mr. W. H. Facon (Sunday-school superintendents) stood at the steps of the chancel and distributed the medals to the scholars and teachers, after Mr. Harwood had given them a brief address.

The celebrations were brought to a close on Monday evening by a joint congregational and Sunday-school soirée, at the Albert Hall, preceded by a tea in the East Circus-street Hall. It was the largest gathering which our community has held in Nottingham for a great number of years. From distant parts of England many old scholars had come specially to do honour to the old school. Mr. B. Dowson, the Chairman of the Congregational Council, presided. Among those present were the Revs. James Harwood, Dendy Agate, J. C. Street, C. J. Street, Lawrence Scott, W. Lindsay, Hugon S. Tayler, J. K. Smith, D. J. Williams, W. W. Robinson, W. H. Burgess, and J. M. Lloyd Thomas; and on the platform appeared Miss Hannah Guilford (President of the Sunday-school) Miss Winser, Mr. J. C. Warren, and Mr. W. H. Facon (superintendents); Mr. J. H. Dunford (hon. sec.), Mr. J. H. Morris (hon. sec. of the old scholars' committee), Mr. J. K. Wright, J.P., Mr. F. Winser, J.P., Mr. A. H. Burgess, Mr. S. Henton, and many others.

The Chairman said that his memory of the school went back over 50 years, and he knew the valuable work which had been accomplished, valuable not only to the scholars and the congregation, but to the town at large. The large number of scholars who had passed through the schools, and the noble army of men and teachers who had worked in them must have affected the morale of the whole town. A great debt was due to those who had organised the centenary celebrations, and the best thanks they could give them was to show every possible interest in the welfare and prosperity of the schools.

The Rev. James Harwood recalled many interesting reminiscences of the school, of the work which it had accomplished, and of the men and women who had laboured in it, and the Rev. J. C. Street, who entered the school as a scholar 61 years ago, spoke of the deep debt which he owed alike to the school and its teachers. He rejoiced in the opportunity of being present to rejoice with those who looked back upon what the school had done. It had been a great luminous force in the city, and a means of spiritual uplifting to many men and women, and it had been conspicuous in all good works. He was convinced that there was a geater need than ever for the Sunday-school movement, and that there was a wonderful future before it for the development of the young life of the nation. It was in the life of the Sunday-school that they must look for the growth of the church.

The Rev. W. Lindsay uttered the greetings of the Christ Church congregation and school; Mr. J. K. Wright spoke of the important part the Sunday-school movement had played in the development of the last century, with special reference to the labours of devoted leaders in the High Pavement School, and Mr. W. H. Facon and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas both thanked all those who had assisted in the celebration.

The meeting, in every way an emphatic success, brought to a close a memorable centenary.

AT a conference of the Charity Organisation Society at Denison House, on Monday, held for the consideration of the best means of increasing the number of efficient voluntary visitors in charitable and social work, over which the Bishop of London presided, Mr. C. S. Loch pleaded for more and closer co-operation among social workers in the metropolis. Rev. W. Copeland Bowie urged that if the leaders of the various churches and sects would agree to forget that they were ecclesiastics and theologians, and remember simply that they were men, and if the visitors were inspired by a pure passion for human service, and not with any sectarian aim, one of the chief difficulties in the way of fuller co-operation would be removed. The Bishop of London, we are glad to learn, assented to this view.

OBITUARY.

HENRY JOSEPH MORTON, J.P.

THE death of Mr. Morton deprives our congregation at Scarborough of its main support and Yorkshire Unitarianism of its most enthusiastic advocate. He was not a rich man, but he was a very liberal giver. Though the infirmities of age pressed heavily upon him in late years, it was difficult to restrain him from taking active part in meetings which taxed his strength and tried his nerves. He was one of those, more numerous a generation ago than they are now, of whom his minister might be sure that if he was absent from service it was because he was either ill or away from home. And this devout observance of religion was with him due neither to habit nor a sense of duty; it was part of the man. What he believed in he was eager to support by presence and speech and purse. It was not in him to stand by and approve those who contended and laboured for the good cause and offer them cold sympathy; he must needs himself bear a hand, even though it were trembling with age and weakness. There was nothing of that sectarianism about him of which Unitarians are always accusing one another, though they are as free from it as poor human nature permits, and certainly freer from it than is any other religious body. He was truly Catholic in goodwill to all who were seeking after God, but he was a Unitarian by conviction, and therefore, being such as he was, he could not but give himself to the furtherance of the faith which commended itself to him as the truth. Nor was his religion confined to observances and beliefs; for him the service of God meant more than it does to most of us the service of man, and he was as zealous for all which concerned the welfare of his fellow men as he was for his own branch of the Church. An ardent Liberal, because he believed that true liberalism meant peace and progress and national righteousness, he gave unfailing and generous support to his party. Indeed in later years we were afraid to approach the subject of politics in his presence, so excited did he get in his denunciation of what appeared to him the injustice and wrong of recent legislation and policy. The gentler offices of charity engaged his time and care no less, or rather perhaps much more, than those which involve our combatant instincts. He was deeply interested in the Fisher Institution, founded for the benefit of Unitarian and Roman Catholic ladies, excluded from participation in other charitable trusts. But it would be too long to recite all the good works with which he was at one time or another actively connected.

His home at Scarborough was seldom without one or more visitors, for besides his many friends all the members of his family were in place to him of children, and as a host he was not only the most liberal but the most entertaining. As a rule a joke does not bear repetition, but somehow his little jokes never failed to amuse, as when he began the evening's rubber with the unfailing admonition, "Now, remember the rules of the game. Trump your partner's card and follow your opponent's lead." This is the appreciation of an old friend, who knew the man and loved him well; but the high esteem in which he was held by those who knew him only as a public man was abundantly proved by the concourse at his funeral service, when the church was crowded in every part by the leading citizens of his town. He was one of those who does honour and brings honour to the church and the party to which he belongs. C. H.

Mr. Morton, whose death at Scarborough on Oct. 13 we recorded last week, was a native of Sheffield. His father died while he was still a boy, and he removed with his elder brother, Mr. Charles Morton, who was a Government inspector of mines, to the neighbourhood of Wakefield. He was trained as a mining engineer, but entered the galvanised iron business, and was so successful that he retired at the age of forty. He was eighty-five when he died. After living for some years in the neighbourhood of Leeds, he settled in 1876 at Scarborough, which remained his home to the end.

The funeral on Wednesday, Oct. 18, called forth a remarkable demonstration of the high esteem and affectionate regard in which Mr. Morton was held by all classes of the community. The service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, both in the Unitarian chapel and afterwards at the cemetery. It was attended by the Mayor and members of the Corporation and magistrates, ministers of many denominations, the Master and other members of the Lodge of Freemasons to which Mr. Morton belonged, representatives of the Yorkshire Penny Bank, the Philosophical Society and other public institutions, and a large concourse of friends from every rank of life. In the course of the service, at which the hymns "Lead, kindly light," and "Hark, hark, my soul" were sung, Mr. Hargrove gave an impressive address, in which he spoke with much feeling of the high character and faithful services of their friend.

Many public tributes have been paid to Mr. Morton's memory. The following passages are from one by the Rev. Frederick Smith, Congregational minister, of Scarborough:—

"I count it a great privilege to have known Mr. Morton with some measure of personal intimacy, and as one not of his religious persuasion I am glad of this opportunity of paying my humble tribute of regard to his memory. He was in everything a pronounced man, and in respect to his theological beliefs frank and outspoken, yet I never felt that between the Unitarian and Trinitarian there was any wide gulf to be spanned before we could be linked together by real Christian fellowship. The basis of his character was unmistakably religious, and whilst it showed itself in the gentleness, courtesy, and tolerance of one of God's gentlemen, it was equally perceptible when he broke out in indignation at any glaring injustice or wrong. However his creed may differ from mine, or mine from his, his life has always been to me as a reflection of the Highest amongst the sons of men. Often I have said it, and say it again, when the churches produce more Christian men of the type of Mr. Morton—men large-hearted, kind, and oving—whose character stands for loyalty to truth, duty, and humanity, the so-called 'man of the street' and the man who is not of the street, and certainly not of the churches, will be impressed by it, and treat our organised Christianity with a friendliness and an appreciation which is now altogether foreign to them.

"Whether right or wrong, according to our standards, his very name stands for action prompted by conviction, duty by high principle, and service for God and man, in which compromise and neutrality were words unknown."

THE REV. RICHARD LYTTLE.

WE deeply regret to have to record the death, at the early age of forty years, of the Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Moneyrea, co. Down, Ireland. Mr. Lyttle attended the International Conference at Geneva; but, being far from well, he shortened his intended stay abroad, and came back to the house of his old friends, Mr. and Mrs. J. Swann, of Bristol, hoping that a little quiet rest would restore him to his usual vigour. After passing through various stages, and at one time seeming nearly recovered, severe complications arose, and he passed away on Sunday last. Among our younger ministers none was more widely known or more universally beloved than Mr. Lyttle. One of nature's big, hearty, genial men, a fearless advocate of the principles he held, he was the most tender and affectionate of friends. An untiring worker, he burdened himself with the direction of many movements, but he always found time for the most unwearied courtesies, and the most generous hospitality.

Mr. Lyttle came of an old Dromore family, his people having long been associated with the Unitarian Church in Ireland. He received his early education at Lurgan College, and by his parents' desire entered a lawyer's office. Only a few months sufficed to prove to him that his early longings to enter the ministry were irresistible. He therefore came over to England, and was entered at the Unitarian Home Missionary College. At the conclusion of the ordinary collegiate course he won the Tate Scholarship, but the partial failure of his eyesight compelled him to resign it again, and to give up the hope of graduating. During his stay in Manchester he made many friends. An active athlete, he played in the University football team against Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, &c. At the same time he was an earnest student and enthusiastic politician, making the acquaintance in the latter connection of many public men.

Mr. Lyttle only held one pastorate, that of the Monyrea congregation. Here he endeared himself to all by his untiring devotion to his duties, his unfailing sympathy, his eloquent preaching, as well as by the splendid purity and unselfishness of his life. The loyal affection of his large congregation was constantly shown in many ways, and recently it expressed itself in the presentation of an address and purse of gold, as well as in the making of him a life governor of the Royal Victoria Hospital, Belfast.

Mr. Lyttle's devotion to the Church of his fathers made him peculiarly sensitive to its honour and responsibilities. Hence, although already burdened with tasks really beyond his strength, he bravely took up the oversight of Ravara and Carrickfergus, and carried on the work there to the last, with such help as he could get.

While his memory will ever be loved in wide circles in our churches, the name of Mr. Lyttle will fill an honourable place in the record of the public life of Ireland. A strong nationalist by conviction, he yet saw that the real need for Ireland was land reform for the farmers, and betterment of their condition for the labourers. Through many years of close study he made himself master of all the intricacies of the land problem, and everywhere he came to be recognised as a leading authority on the subject. He was frequently examined by Land Courts and Commissioners, and he was elected to represent Ulster at the Great Convention of the Irish Race held in Dublin. He was the founder and one of the secretaries of the Ulster Farmers' and Labourers' Association, of which his friend, Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., is the president. So conspicuous were his services to this cause that recently the farmers of Ulster presented him with an illuminated address, signed by representatives of all sects and parties. Mr. Lyttle was a brilliant platform speaker, and his services were in constant request for political, temperance, and religious meetings. His death leaves a great blank in the life of our churches, in the public life of Ireland, and in the hearts of his countless friends.

The body of our friend was removed from Bristol to Belfast on Tuesday evening, the friends travelling with it being Mrs. J. Swann, the Revs. Charles Peach and T. P. Spedding, and Mr. T. Munn (a Moneyrea student at the H.M.C.). On arrival at Belfast the body was received by a great gathering of friends, and removed for interment at Moneyrea.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"ON TRUST."

IN one of his delightful books about animals, I think it is "Lives of the Hunted," Seton Thompson tells the story of a woolly-coated little puppy that learned very early to be obedient. Chink lived with his master in a lonely part of the Yellowstone Park in the Rocky Mountains. They lived in a tent far from the usual track for travellers, and if he had not had Chink for company Chink's master would have been very lonely and very dull.

For Chink was great fun. He was ready for anything, always on the go, always up and doing. "Indeed, he would do anything he was told to do, except keep still." He never tired of trying to catch birds, and more than once he got into trouble by chasing wild animals.

One of these, not a fox and not a wolf, but something between the two, called a coyote, was in the habit of prowling about the tent at night for scraps and of watching from a distance in the daytime. If Chink ventured off alone this coyote would chase him back.

One day Chink's master mounted his horse, said, "Chink, you watch the tent," and rode away over the mountains, leaving Chink obediently curled up on some sacking.

Evening came, and no master to relieve Chink, who was now getting very hungry. There was some bacon in the tent, wrapped in a bag, but that was sacred. His master had told him to "watch it." Chink would have starved rather than touch it. He ventured out in hope of finding a mouse or something to stay the pangs of hunger, when he was suddenly pounced on by the coyote, and the old chase was repeated as Chink dashed back to the tent.

He was a mere puppy yet, but the moment that coyote tried to follow into the tent—his master's tent—Chink forgot all his fears, and turned on his enemy. Then began a siege, for the coyote came back every little while and walked round the tent, or marched up to the open door, to be met at once face to face by poor little Chink, who, really half dead with fear, was brave again as soon as he saw any attempt to injure the things in his charge.

All this time Chink had nothing to eat. He could have torn a hole in the sack and eaten some bacon, but he would not, for that was on trust. He would not betray his master's trust in any way. He was ready to die at his post.

For four days and four nights of misery did this heroic little dog keep his place; and when at last the owner of the tent returned, there at the door, exchanging growls and snapping at each other, were the fierce coyote and poor little Chink. His master had known before that he was obedient and a faithful watch-dog. Now Chink had shown himself trustworthy more than ever, and the two became very close friends.

And may not we also learn a lesson in trustworthiness from that faithful little dog?

Anything given into our charge by other people should be guarded with greater care than things that really belong to us. Toys or books that are lent to us are in our charge, and only when we have learned to be trustworthy in such matters can we be trusted also in bigger things.

Sometimes people have money left to them, not for their own use, but for the use of others. It is called trust money, and they are called trustees because it is entrusted to their care. A trustee is chosen because he has been trustworthy in other ways.

Messages are given to us in trust for other people; and to be careless in delivering them is to fail in a trust.

Perhaps you have a pet animal, a bird, or a rabbit to feed regularly. Or you may have a younger brother or sister entrusted to your care. If it seems a bother to give up your play to feed a pet or to keep younger children happy, just remember that you are trusted to do it, and it will no longer seem a bother.

Nelson, who was trusted to guard England and keep her safe in the days of Napoleon, began as a boy to show himself trustworthy. His home was in a country village in Norfolk, where his father was rector. Horatio and his elder brother William went to school—a boarding school—at some distance. It was long before the days of trains, and the boys used to travel to school on horseback.

One winter, at the end of the Christmas holidays, they started on their journey, but turned back because there had been a fall of snow. William, who did not much like the journey, said the snow was too deep for them to go on. Their father said if that was so they certainly should not go, but asked them to try once more, saying that he would leave it to their honour to go if it were fit. "If the road is dangerous, you may return; but remember, boys, I leave it to your honour." They tried again. The snow proved deep enough to give them a good excuse for not going on. But Horatio would not be persuaded to turn back. "We must go on," he said; "remember, brother, it was left to our honour!" Their father had trusted them and they must be trustworthy.

How ashamed we feel if through disobedience to command, through neglect of duty, we have forfeited the trust of others! Is any punishment so much of a punishment as the words "I cannot trust you, I cannot trust you again yet."

And what praise, what other reward is equal to that of being trusted? Is it not worth any effort, any amount of trying—again and again—to win the trust of those whom we love, and who love us?

And does not God, too, trust us? He gives us the guidance of the inward voice and trusts us to obey. We are not kept by force from disobeying, from going the wrong way, like a dog held in by a leash. We are free to go our own way. We can choose, but we are trusted to choose the right; we are trusted to obey, we are trusted to do our duty. We are trusted to be trustworthy.

A MORAL CHALLENGE.

To the current number of the Hibbert Journal the editor, the Rev. L. P. JACKS, contributes an article entitled, "Is the Moral Supremacy of Christianity in Danger?" It is an impressive challenge to Christianity to consider the religious significance of the achievements of the Japanese.

In the early days of Christianity, says Mr. JACKS, it had the power of assimilating elements from various pagan religions; it was influenced by them; its vigour and freedom were such that while remaining always itself, it could learn from others, and adapt foreign thought to its own use. It had the power of give and take which marks the most vital and effective men. It acted like wise colonists, not forcing their own uncompromising views on others, but working for a higher unity to which colonists and aborigines have alike contributed their best. The kind of missionary Mr. JACKS warns us against might be compared to CHARLES LAMB'S Scotchman. "He brings his total wealth into company, and gravely unpacks it. His riches are always about him. He never stoops to catch a glittering something in your presence to share it with you before he quite knows whether it be true touch or not. You cannot cry 'Halves' to anything he finds. He does not find, but brings." Early Christianity working among pagan religions found as well as brought the truth. The Greeks and Romans might justly cry "Halves" to many Christian doctrines. But for the last eight hundred years Christianity has been unaffected by the thought of other religions. Great changes have taken place in Christian thought and feeling, but they have been produced by men inside the Christian world. "Christianity has been unvisited by any shock from without." She has believed that she produced the best men and that she was certain to conquer the world. The rise of the Japanese affects the claim of Christianity, says Mr. JACKS, to be the universal teacher of mankind. She can no longer continue gravely unpacking her goods before mankind without considering what they have to offer.

We are forced to recognise, whether we like it or not, that a very notable civilisation has been produced outside of Christianity. Mr. JACKS gives a most impressive description of the Japanese character and methods. There may be some who will put it aside as exaggerated. For our own part we feel rather its sober-mindedness, its close adherence to facts, its genuine and wise appreciation of what is best in an alien faith. He is stating a most important truth when he says, "The Yellow Peril is an ethical phenemenon." It is not merely the rise of a nation with guns and a navy and a host of unconquerable men into a first-class fighting Power. It is the rise of a new civilisation, a new type of moral character which has been produced under the influence of a non-Christian religion.

How does this nation, whose ideals and actions have been inspired by Buddhism and Shintoism, compare with the European nations whose ideals and actions have been inspired, or are supposed to have been inspired, by Christianity? Mr. JACKS describes in fine, self-restrained, strong language, worthy of his theme, the silent self-restraint and strength and devotion of the Japanese. "She has not made a spectacle of her fight for life; she has encouraged no reporters to witness the shedding of heroic blood; but, as though some terrible operation of surgery were in progress, she has repulsed the sightseer, and locked the door."

He tells us, with a sad sense of the contrast presented by our own country, of the power which moral education exerts over the Japanese. Frugality, fealty, filial piety, a high regard for the obligations of truth, freedom from mercenary motives, faithfulness in keeping promises, the readiness to sacrifice life without a murmur at the call of duty, these things are not merely talked about at school. They become part of the life-blood of the children; they are an indelible ideal impressed upon them in early days which they carry with them through all their life. "The will-power of the community is undergoing a process of continuous cultivation; individual selfishness is being checked, the sense of obligation to some kind of 'not-self' is being wrought into the fibre of the race."

In what Mr. JACKS has to say about the influence of art upon the Japanese there is much which reminds us not only of the conceptions but of the force and beauty of language of RUSKIN. "The love of beauty is an active force in the daily life of the whole Japanese nation. With us the beautiful is an adornment and a luxury, with them it is daily meat and drink; with us it is the purchased possession of the rich, with them it is the birthright of the people. . . The mood of a man who cannot be anywhere without at once desiring to be somewhere else—the motoritis of character—is not his. He can be content under privations which no European would tolerate; can retain the dignity of a man in the midst of extreme poverty; can find in all conditions a sufficient joy in life." "So bred and nurtured, she has accumulated a vast reserve of moral force, compared with which the hoarded ingots of the CZAR are little better than dross." "The splendid qualities of her soldiers and sailors, the steadiness of nerve, the accuracy of aim, the coolnes of advance, the deadliness of attack, the self-immolation of regiments at the word of command, are not unconnected with the fact that she alone among living nations has a truly national art, that her senses are refined and her tastes fastidious, that her poor love beauty and seek their pleasures among flowers."

Over against this picture of the Japanese Mr. JACKS sets the condition of Christendom as he sees it. "The contrast then reduces itself to this: That whereas Buddhist Japan has both a national art and national morality, we have neither." There may be tens of thousands of individuals who love and seek for righteousness, but "the community as such can appeal to no certain principles for the moral guidance of its acts."

Especially striking is the contrast when we think of the so-called religious teaching in our schools. "We have made idols of our theological jealousies and ecclesiastical divisions, and in blind devotion to these have trusted to scraps of doctrinal patter to form the manhood of the race, and to save us from being as Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment. In how many of the schools of the people are the lessons of private and social duty being effectively taught? How many make it their aim to teach the elements of self-respect and self-control? Where do we find a higher place given to courtesy, self-subordination, temperance, courage, filial piety than to the Latin Accidence or 'the requirements of the Code'?" It is easy to get into an argumentative mood in reading Mr. JACKS' article, which would make a man impervious to the splendid moral energy and insight of which it is full. No doubt there are many arguable points. It is easy to say that Mr. JACKS has exaggerated the virtues of the Japanese and the defects of Christian nations. It is easy to say that if he has not exaggerated, still this kind of attack on the failure of Christianity does no good. It is easy to say that Christianity ought not to be condemned for the sins of its followers. Our answer to the first two objections would consist in pointing to the work of RUSKIN and CARLYLE. These men were amongst the most cleansing and inspiring moral forces of the nineteenth century. Their hatred of shams, their indignation against evil, their persistent determination to contrast the ideal with the actual, their splendid faith in the possibility of vast moral progress, were amongst the noblest contributions to Christian life and effort which were produced by the last century.

Tolstoy is continuing on the same lines to-day, but with what we feel to be a certain narrowness of logic, a certain separation from the best life of his own and other nations, which, in spite of their exaggerations, could not be said of Carlyle and Ruskin. In Mr. Jacks' article we feel a determination to face facts and to bring them into the light of the ideal, an indignation with "doctrinal patter" and smug self-complacency united with a sympathy for the masses, and a faith in the possibility of social justice and national righteousness which remind us continually both of the method and the spirit of Carlyle and Ruskin. There is no suggestion that the Christian ideal is to blame. "That the Christian ideal of moral excellence is splendid, even unsurpassed, no one doubts." But it is no less certain that the West has failed to justify that ideal both in national and private life.

The greatness of the Japanese ought not to make us change Christianity for Buddhism. It is the challenge of a religious friend, not seeking to destroy, but to make us ashamed of our inconsistency and blindness and half-heartedness and irreligion. There is no doctrinal or intellectual challenge from Japan; it is a moral challenge. The more a true Christian learns to admire and respect a true Buddhist, the more he will desire to become, not a Buddhist, but a better Christian. It is with the object of making better Christians that Mr. Jacks' noble article is written.

London Unitarian Laymen's Club.—The first Club dinner of the new session was held at the Inns of Court Hotel on Monday evening. After dinner the President, Mr. H. B. Lawford, before introducing the guest of the evening, made a statement as to the position of the Club and the programme for the coming session. This, in addition to the three regular meetings for dinner and conference, included a visit to the Wandsworth congregation on Thursday evening, November 16 (the evening after the Choral Society concert at Essex Hall); a theatrical performance at St. George's Hall, arranged by the President, on Wednesday evening, December 13, for the benefit of the Blackfriars Mission; and, it was hoped, an "At Home" at Essex Hall to the London Sunday School Teachers, the date of which was not yet fixed. The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth was the guest of the evening, who gave an eloquent address on "The Position and Prospects of Unitarianism," followed by a frank discussion. Mr. Robin Roscoe, 16, Kemplay-road, Hampstead, is hon. secretary of the Club.

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

Fourth Annual Report of the Special Committee of the London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly.*

The Public Questions Committee desire once more to urge upon the Assembly the duty of bringing a moral and religious spirit to bear upon the great questions of the day, and the necessity of an intelligent comprehension of the issues at stake, and the best means of making the moral and religious spirit practically effective.

Against the War Spirit.

Foremost among the questions of the day stands the ever-present alternative for the nations of the world, "Peace or War."

Nearly 2,000 years ago were uttered the words: "Peace on earth, goodwill toward men." This was the principle on which the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth were based. To-day in Europe he is acknowledged by all the nations as Lord and Master. Yet Europe is an armed camp, and England, along with other so-called Christian states, is prepared to send forth men to make war upon their fellow-men. Surely our churches should make a resolute and definite stand against the war spirit, and condemn in the strongest way possible the militarism which everywhere is so prevalent. The war spirit is absolutely contrary to the spirit and teachings of Christianity. It is altogether un-Christian, and appeals to the lowest passions in man. Modern Democracy is dead against war, and is coming more and more to view it as a mere survival of barbarism. We confidently appeal to our churches to strive most earnestly to crush this war spirit, to cultivate the true brotherhood of all mankind, and to help forward the time when the nations shall learn war no more.

The Crushing Weight of Armaments.

The strain upon the resources of civilised nations for war purposes is becoming intolerable. The insane rivalry between European nations as to which shall have the most numerous army and the biggest fleet is seriously crippling and hindering the human race alike in their struggle for material well-being, and in their efforts for freedom and righteousness. Our churches may play a manly, a Christian part, in destroying this war spirit, and persuading men to appeal to reason rather than to brute force.

We hail with delight the peace which the President of the United States has been instrumental in bringing about between Russia and Japan, and the peaceful settlement of the dispute between Norway and Sweden. We trust that the reason of the people will lean more and more towards arbitration, and that the united efforts of diplomacy will be devoted to the concurrent reduction of armaments.

Chinese Labour.

The later developments of the Labour Problem in the recently conquered South African territories have fully justified the forebodings of those who opposed from the first the introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the Transvaal mines. It has become abundantly clear that the conditions under which the Chinese coolies are maintained bear a strong likeness to slavery; and the volume of protest is growing, both in South Africa and Great Britain, against this reversal of the best traditions of humane British rule. The whole condition of trade and labour in South Africa appears to be unhappy in the extreme; and in this, as in other directions, the call for a new directing spirit and policy is plain and urgent.

The Aliens' Refuge.

At the same time an outcry has been raised against Alien Immigration into our own country; an outcry which, it is important to notice, has not been supported by the responsible leaders of the organised English workers. The menace to British labour from destitute "aliens" is extremely small; and the right of free asylum to political and religious refugees is one of the noblest and most praiseworthy traditions of our history. Our trade and commerce, our literature and religion, owe much to aliens, many of whom arrived on our shores in the condition of destitute fugitives. We who wish to remove the ancient barriers of social ignorance, jealousy, and hate which have too long separated the nations of the world, must beware of closing the door against foreign immigrants. We want not only freedom of trade, but also the freest and fullest personal intercourse amongst nations.

The Unemployed.

Your Committee has drawn attention year by year to various aspects of the general question of poverty—that grinding and disabling destitution which continues in the midst of the increasing wealth of the country. In the last report references were made to the aggravated amount of unemployment. Since then one event has occurred which may prove to be of considerable importance. The Unemployed Act is a tentative measure, but it is a reassertion, in however hesitating a fashion, of a principle of law which had been allowed to become obsolete—the principle, viz., of the duty of the State to provide employment for persons who are willing to work. Ultimately the principle may carry us far; for the immediate present little is to be expected, and we again begin the winter with the knowledge that many good men and true will be destitute before the cold days are over.

In spite of all the improvements of the last fifty years the same story of undeserved poverty still confronts us. The mass of this poverty is in the towns, because the mass of the population is there. Members of settlements and others continue from time to time to investigate the conditions of labour, and they have ever to recall our attention to the same evils which shocked us when the Royal Commission on Sweating was appointed. Industrious people who work hard and fare hard are unable to earn a living wage; girls develop into women unfit for motherhood, and women grow prematurely old; men are thrown aside before they are middle aged, and boys who should be at school are forced to supplant their fathers. And for these things there is no adequate remedy apparent within the limits of the system of competitive industry.

Housing.

Not less serious are the conditions of the home. Improved means of transit have partially relieved the pressure of population in some city areas; at the same time fresh suburban districts are continually becoming overcrowded, and the poor are still compelled to live in inadequate rooms, paying rents which throw an intolerable strain on family ties, and render health, to say nothing of comfort, an impossible ideal. Efforts, individual and collective, are being increasingly directed to the solution of this problem. Mr. Howard's dream of a Garden City is in process of being fashioned into bricks and mortar. Bournville is a good illustration of the possible convenience and beauty of the outskirts of a large town. And it is hardly necessary to call attention to the improvements in London and many other large towns. But the housing difficulty still confronts us in undiminished seriousness, and demands a more comprehensive consideration than it has yet received.

The poverty question has here been treated as a town question, because it appears in the towns in its more concentrated form. But the country housing problem is not less serious, nor should we forget that a recent Board of Trade report has shown the average earnings of agricultural labourers in many parts of the country to be entirely inadequate to the maintenance of family life.

Education.

The Education question is ever with us, and is, unfortunately, a question of "strife and debate." But there is an imperative feeling abroad that the entire control must be in the hands of the people and their representatives, and that they must not tolerate the imposition of any disability or disadvantage either on teachers or scholars in consequence of their religious opinions or belief. The Education Acts have been continually amended and altered from the very first attempt to provide public education; and it should be possible so to amend them as to secure complete popular control and freedom from all religious disabilities.

Temperance.

The subject of temperance is one which should occupy the earnest attention of all our churches. The Licensing Act of 1902 came into force this year, but its effect on the issue of licences cannot be ascertained until the publication of the Government returns. By destroying the discretion of the magistrates as to granting licences on expiry, however, the Act has taken away the power of public opinion to reduce the number of licensed houses, whilst by creating a limited compensation fund, and prohibiting reduction beyond its amount, the power of the trade and the value of licensed premises have been increased.

Until this Act is amended or repealed, therefore, we are confined to moral suasion, and there is greater need than ever to concentrate our efforts on influencing individuals to practice abstinence, while creating a public opinion that shall insist on restoring to the magistrates their former powers, and conferring on localities the right to control the drink traffic in their midst.

Opinion Against Alcohol.

During the year, however, there have been many encouraging signs of progress. Eminent medical men, notably Sir Victor Horsley and Sir Frederick Treves, have boldly declared alcohol to be always a poison, never a food. At important conferences of merchants and manufacturers in the City of London and elsewhere its use, even in moderation, has been declared detrimental to business and efficiency. Many local authorities, led by Woolwich, of which a member of this Assembly, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, is Mayor, have placarded their districts with warnings against the evils of strong drink. More important still, in its probable effect on the future, the Board of Education, in response to a petition of 15,000 medical men, have issued instructions for teaching in our elementary schools the nature of alcohol and its effects. The gradual reduction in the national drink bill since 1899, amounting in 1904 to no less than £17,000,000, seems to indicate a real improvement in the drinking habits of the people.

It still remans true, however, that the evils of intemperance rival those of "war, pestilence, and famine," and so long as its effects continue in unemployment, misery, want, ruined homes, blighted characters, and premature deaths, so long are we as religious men called upon to withstand it by every means in our power, especially by the example of personal abstinence and the promotion and support of Bands of Hope and temperance societies in connection with our churches.

Duty to Dumb Animals.

Before bringing this report to an end, the Committee would bring before the Assembly the problem of the relation of man to the lower animals. Probably no member of the Assembly would question the fact that the lower animals have rights, certainly no one would deny that man has duties towards them.

Less than a century ago the dumb animals were absolutely without protection from the law of the land. No cruelty to animals, however wanton or brutal, was punishable by law. Acts of 1849 and 1854 made it a punishable offence to treat domestic animals cruelly. There was nothing in these Acts to exclude experiments made for scientific purposes from their scope; but when public attention was called to the practice of vivisection it was thought at least doubtful whether convictions could be obtained in any case where the interests of science could be pleaded in defence. It is also probable that many practices of the slaughter-house and some of the practices of sport are violations of these Acts, but that the general sense of the community would admit the plea of necessity or custom, so that convictions could not be obtained.

Many persons who are dissatisfied with the present state of the law desire to revert to the principle of these Acts, to strengthen, as public opinion allows, the general laws against cruelty, to grant no exemptions, and so to educate public opinion as to make it possible progressively to obtain convictions against practices not in accordance with the law, but yet practically allowed as necessary or customary.

Law as to Vivisection.

This, however, has not been the course of actual legislation and practice. The Act of 1876 is typical. It dealt exclusively with scientific experiments, and it introduced the new principle of making express exemptions from the action of the law. Thus, on the one hand, it extended protection (as far as scientific experiments are concerned) to all vertebrate animals, domestic or other, and even to animals under anæsthetics; but, on the other hand, it sanctioned the issue of licences and special licences, which would give the holder authority to do the very things prohibited in the statute; and if any holder of a licence did things illegal under that licence it protected him from all proceedings not expressly sanctioned by the Secretary of State. It is easy to see that this Act was the result of a conflict between different views, and was not based on any common principle. It resulted in curious anomalies, such as: that painful operations if performed on a wild animal were (apparently) legal unless done for a scientific purpose, and if performed on a domestic animal legal only if done with such a purpose and under licence.

In 1900, however, general protection was extended to all wild vertebrate animals, but the Act was so worded as not to be applicable to ordinary forms of sport; while the most usual of them were expressly exempted from its action, as also (somewhat strangely as the Act deals with wild animals only) are slaughter-houses, &c. It seems probable, however, that many forms of trapping and destroying vermin and some forms of sport must be technical violations of the law.

It is clear that those who are dissatisfied with the present state of the law may either accept (whether provisionally or otherwise) the principle of legalised exemptions from the action of the law, and may endeavour gradually to restrict their area, and make the conditions under which they are granted more stringent; or they may aim at the abolition of all express legal permission or licence to do things which are illegal under the general law, and proceed on lines indicated in connection with the Acts of 1849 and 1854.

The only clear point that seems to arise from this survey is that the fundamental requirement is the growth of an enlightened public opinion, resting upon something like a philosophical grasp of the ethical principles that should regulate the relations of man to the lower animals. The attempt to formulate such principles lies beyond the scope of this report, but your Committee recommend the subject to the very careful consideration of the members of the Assembly as a question involving vital moral and religious issues.

Visitors passing through Nottingham should by no means miss the opportunity of going into the High Pavement Chapel, to see the great Burne-Jones window in the chancel, erected to the memory of the late P. W. Clayden. It is a glorious work of art, a wonderful addition to the beauty of the chapel.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH EASTERN COUNTIES.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventeenth Annual Meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Non-Subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South Eastern Counties was held at Unity Church, Islington, on Thursday, October 19.

Morning service was held in the church, conducted by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, of Reading, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead. "Our relation to Jesus and the duty of the Christian Church" was the subject of the sermon, which we hope very soon to publish in full. There was a large congregation.

After lunch in the Myddleton Hall, the business meeting was held in the schoolroom, the President, Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., in the chair.

The Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN, hon. sec., having called the roll, and the reports, which had been previously printed, being taken as read, the President called upon the treasurer to present the accounts.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON said that although he must admit there was a serious adverse balance, he was quite content, because he was convinced the money was being spent in a good cause. He regretted, however, that the congregational collections were less this year, as showing a lack of appreciation of their work. Annual subscriptions and donations amounted to £145 8s., and the collections to £111 14s. 11d. The grants received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association amounted altogether to £229 15s. 10d., including £100 towards the stipend of the minister of the Assembly. The grants made to congregations amounted altogether to £246 11s. 4d., and the accounts showed an adverse balance of £210; but he was happy to say that the deficit of £70 on the work at Walthamstow had been met by two special gifts from friends to whom he had appealed, and the Bermondsey deficit of £38 16s. had been paid by the Trustees from the rent of the cottages, which they had received as a gift from Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. Thus the deficit was not so serious as it would have been; and yet if their work was to be continued, and especially if there was to be any extension of their activities, it was essential that a larger annual income should be secured. He also referred with much satisfaction to the account of the Auxiliary Fund, by means of which eleven ministers in the province had been enabled to insure in the Ministers' Pension Fund. They had invested funds amounting to £868 16s., which he was anxious to increase to at least £2,000, to secure the permanent income which that amount would yield.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The report called special attention to the work at Bermondsey and Walthamstow, where progress had been made, and to courses of lectures given at Bulverhythe, near Hastings, and at Guildford. Warm acknowledgment was made of the services rendered by lay preachers to the Assembly. The discontinuance of the Provincial Assembly Messenger, through lack of support, was noted with regret. The year's changes were noted in the following passages:—

"The ministers who have resigned their pulpits are the Rev. George Carter, whose long and faithful years of service well deserved the handsome presentation made to him; the Revs. J. E. Stronge, S. Burrows, S. S. Brettell, M.A., E. Rattenbury Hodges, and C. A. Ginever, B.A. Your Committee extend a cordial welcome to the following ministers who have settled in the province during the year—the Revs. Addison A. Charlesworth (Highgate), Priestley Prime (Brighton), John Page Hopps (Little Portland-street), Felix Taylor, B.A. (Richmond), Henry Rawlings, M.A. (Hackney), A. F. G. Fletcher (Peckham), and A. S. Hurn (Acton), and to the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., who commences his ministry at Quex-road, Kilburn, on December 3.

"The Committee, with sorrow, have to record the death of Mr. A. B. Midlane, a lay preacher for many years; Mr. T. Smith Osler, a former member of the Committee; Mr. Clement F. Dear, formerly the lay minister of the Southend Church, who had also served on the Committee; and Mr. J. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, president of the Southern Unitarian Association, and hon. secretary of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund. To the relatives of each the Committee give their sincere sympathy."

THE MINISTER'S REPORT.

The report of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, minister of the Assembly, gave a record of his helpful work in many of the churches, both in Sunday services and meetings of societies, with an expression of his thanks for the ready and efficient help of the lay preachers. The opening passage of the report was as follows:—

"Another year's work has been done, and in reviewing it many thoughts are awakened, some bright with light, and others shaded with cloud, while the work is surrounded with difficulties, great opportunities are presented to us as churches free from all dogmatic conditions. The present state of society in relation to religious thought and life is one which should prove favourable to the growth of our congregations, for people are getting weary of creeds and formularies and of endless strife about mint and anise and cummin to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law. Whether our churches will attract those who are seeking a broader faith than orthodoxy offers, will depend very much upon the spiritual life and vigour which they manifest. Unfortunately most of our churches are weak, although fifty years ago they were strong. In those days they were largely our glory. But now the great trade centres have weakened our country churches by the drain upon the population, and if they are to maintain their position brotherly help must be given them from without. They are worthy of help, for amid many disadvantages, and surrounded with an atmosphere of religious and social scorn and dislike, they are doing a quiet but effectual work for purity of life, and for the cause of truth and liberty and personal righteousness. The assistance which the Provincial Assembly renders these weaker churches, is adding strength to all our churches, for it must be remembered that the strength of the chain is but that of its weakest link. Our strength is not in the few comparatively prosperous churches, but in the health and vigour of our smaller communities."

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The PRESIDENT in moving the adoption of the reports and accounts, spoke as follows:—

A year ago you did me the honour of appointing me President of the Provincial Assembly of the Non-Subscribing Churches of London and the South Eastern Counties, churches, which, in spite of much discouragement and persecution in the past, have maintained their belief in the Christian teaching of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Men, and have stood for freedom of religious thought and worship through times when the doctrines of the atonement by blood and everlasting punishment for the non-redeemed were far more universally held than is now the case. Through generations of discouragement and isolation many of these churches in their quiet country towns have entered their protest against those unchristian doctrines. It was to overcome that isolation and to form a bond of fellowship amongst them, and to enable the stronger to help the weaker, the richer to assist the poorer, that this Assembly was instituted.

How far we have succeeded during the past year in the furtherance of this object you are able to judge from the report of your Committee, and also from the report of the minister of the Assembly. From them you will see that our zealous minister, Mr. Edwards, and other members of your Committee have paid many visits to the churches on the roll, and have done much to inspire and help them. In the case of certain congregations pecuniary help has been given, but owing to the extremely limited income of the Assembly, this has largely come out of the pocket of our excellent and devoted treasurer, Mr. Harrison. In Bermondsey much progress has been made, and, thanks to the zeal of the minister and his congregation, this church will no doubt soon be self-supporting; but the church at Walthamstow, which is steadily improving in numbers, will require assistance for some time to come, and unless this good work is to be allowed to drop, it is essential that our subscription list should be very considerably enlarged.

The President then referred to the treasurer's statement and the serious balance which had to be faced, and then continued: This, of course, cannot be repeated, and it is for you to say whether we must give up the work for want of funds or whether, by more generous support, you will enable it to be continued. Leaving this for your most careful and earnest consideration, I now have to put before you a wider question for the consideration of the Assembly. At a time when the religious thought of the age is widening rapidly, largely affected by the discoveries of science and the teaching of a more progressive philosophy, and very many people are being daily brought to the same conclusions as ourselves, how does it come about that we see from the reports of our minister for the last two years that the congregations of our churches in the country do not increase, and, in fact, hardly hold their own?

This seems to me to be a question for the serious consideration of our Assembly. All around us we see the old narrow forms of belief yielding to a more progressive Christianity. In Scotland, that former stronghold of Calvinism, we now see the very interesting phenomenon of a State church asking and obtaining from Parliament power to free itself from the narrow creeds and confessions of the 17th century; and I have, during this past summer, been listening to sermons from ministers of the Established Church of Scotland which might well have been delivered in any of our own churches, so completely are they in harmony with our own highest ideals. In London we see by the large congregations which go to hear the Rev. Dr. Hunter that a large number of learned and thoughtful men share these views. From one high placed in society I have heard the remark that all thinking men are Unitarians now. In sermons preached in some of the churches of the Congregational body these views are clearly stated. In the proceedings of the International Conference at Geneva it appears that these views are largely held by men of distinction in the city of Calvin.

What, then, is the explanation of the phenomenon that, whilst many of the congregations are waning, our views are being far more largely held than ever before? May it not be true that to very many people our name "Unitarian" expresses too much of a negation, the denial of the Trinity and of the crude doctrines of the atonement and the redemption by sacrifice; and as it does not express our belief in the teachings of Jesus, it acts as a deterrent to those who, having given up those crude doctrines, feel the need, not of constant denial of them, but of some more positive teaching of the Christianity of Jesus as affecting the problems of our lives to-day.

The name has been a necessary and useful one in the past, and it is difficult to replace it; but if, as is undoubtedly the case, it deters many who hold our views from joining in the worship of our free churches, I ask you to consider whether it is not possible to give the name with its negations less prominence, and to dwell rather on the fact that we are followers of the teachings of Jesus.

It appears to me that we are running the risk of being left behind by the great wave of progressive thought of the 20th century if, whilst others are moving rapidly on with the flood, we are content to rest in our quiet backwater, and pride ourselves on the great things we have fought for in the past.

The President concluded by moving the adoption of the report and accounts.

The Rev. James Harwood reported on behalf of the Advisory Committee that during the year two students who had completed their course at one of the Wesleyan Colleges had applied for admission to the ministry, and had received the certificate of the Committee. They were now settled with congregations in the district—the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher at Peckham, and the Rev. A. S. Hurn at Acton.

The reports of the Committee, the Postal Mission, and S. S. Union were then unanimously adopted. As to the report of the Public Questions Committee (which is printed in full in our present issue), a discussion arose as to whether it should be adopted or should be simply received.

It was moved by the Rev. F. H. Jones, secretary of the Committee, and seconded by Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, that the report be received and adopted.

As an amendment, it was moved by Mr. Edgar Worthington and seconded by the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, that the report be received and the best thanks of the Assembly be given to the Committee.

For the amendment it was argued that, while it was of the greatest value to receive such a report, in which vital public questions were set in the light of moral and religious principle, and the subjects thus brought to the attention of the churches for their earnest consideration, it was not reasonable to ask the Assembly to adopt the report. Where so many questions were dealt with, and there was bound to be a great variety of independent opinion on various points, such a vote of formal adoption could have little value, and it was more respectful to the Committee simply gratefully to accept their report. It was pointed out by the Rev. V. D. Davis that that was the course pursued by the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and that after the reception of the report, if it were desired that the Assembly should make a public declaration on some definite question, such as temperance or education, a resolution in that sense was moved on behalf of the Committee, the matter could be thoroughly discussed, and a distinct vote taken. That, he urged, was the proper course for their Assembly also to take.

On a vote, the amendment was declared to be carried by thirty-eight against twenty-nine, ministers and delegates alone voting. As a substantive motion the amendment, simply receiving the report, with thanks to the Committee, was carried by fifty-three against seven.

On the motion of Mr. John Harrison, Mr. W. Wallace Bruce was then re-elected President; the other officers were re-elected; and the Committee was elected, the Rev. Priestley Prime and Messrs. O. A. Shrubsole, Alfred Thompson, and Edgar Worthington being the new members.

The Public Questions Committee was elected, Mr. H. G. Chancellor asking that his name should be withdrawn; also the Advisory Committee, and the correspondents of the S. S. Union.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor was elected preacher for next year, and on the usual ballot the Rev. L. P. Jacks was elected supporter.

A cordial welcome was offered to representatives of kindred Associations, on which Mr. David Martineau replied for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. Hahnemann Epps for the London District Society, Mr. Ion Pritchard for the Sunday School Association, and the Rev. S. Burrows for the General Baptist Association.

Public Meeting.

After tea a Public Meeting was held in the church.

Dr. Herbert Smith, who presided, referred to the encouraging nature of the reports they had heard that day, and then to the great stimulus of the International Meetings at Geneva, of which he gave an interesting account. He thought that it was not generally realised how momentous were the changes going on in the religious world; but when the history of that period came to be written, it would be seen that a great Reformation had been effected, as great as that of the sixteenth century. He recalled the words of Professor Montet at Geneva, addressed to English and American Unitarians: "You are our strength"—and said that the members of their little churches should realise that they had part in a great movement, and ought to take courage. Nothing better could happen to the Unitarian body than that their ministers should have the opportunity of attending the next meeting of the International Council, which was to be held at Boston. He made the suggestion in all seriousness that a fund should be started to enable their ministers to go to Boston for that purpose, a fund from which those who could not afford to go without assistance should be able to draw. He hoped the matter would be brought before their various bodies, in the interest of the denomination as a whole.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor spoke of the importance in religion of putting conduct before creed. It was a harder gospel, but that was what they were trying to preach. The previous Monday was the anniversary of the burning of Bishop Latimer. He was a popular preacher, a really heroic preacher, who said, "The greatest heresy is a bad life." Such preachers were needed at the present day, and Unitarianism would do its greatest work if it realised that high courage to live the true life was the most vital thing. Courage they needed, and with courage, sympathy.

The Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, Mayor of Woolwich, pleaded for more loyal support of the work of the Assembly, which was thoroughly worth doing. It was true they were in want of money, but he thought that if the Committee would go on with their work in faith, believing in the sacredness of their cause, friends would rally round them and the money would be found. Their body, he thought, was suffering from palsy. But in the New Testament story he noted that it was said of the man so afflicted that he was "sick of the palsy," and so there was hope for him. He did not know that the same could yet be said of the denomination; but when that was the case there would be hope of their recovery. It was not the people from other churches that he wanted to get, but the great multitude who were drifting away from all religious associations. There were thousands of young men and women who needed just the help they might give, to make them feel the worth of life and the power of religion. He believed thoroughly in all social work, but the religious impulse was essential. They must gather in the people for the sake of that higher life.

The Revs. S. Gardner Preston and E. Savell Hicks and Mr. H. G. Chancellor also spoke, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the meeting to a close.

The part assigned to us is to do, to act, to strive; yet the best things are not directly won by our striving, but come to us as given.—S. G. Merriam.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MINISTER'S TRAINING.

Sir,—The last paragraph in the article "In Religious Fellowship," in your issue of the 14th, should be printed and kept daily before every student for the Christian Ministry, and every pastor of the Christian Church.

The wise suggestions made are not mere counsels of perfection, but more possible than many men believe. Years ago, I happened by accident to stroll into a decidedly unattractive episcopal chapel in a West of England town. It was a large, old-fashioned style of place, with straight back pews, and nothing I saw explained the fact of so good a congregation. There must have been six hundred people present when the one clergyman walked reverently up to the reading stand. During my school-days I had to attend service at our parish church, where highly educated clergy officiated, but, devout as all doubtless were, it lacked life, and was never soul inspiring. But the service I took part in by accident on the Sunday referred to and the following Sunday, was a revelation to me, and can be fittingly described by quoting part of your article. "There was truly united worship and rejoicing in the hymns of praise, all things were done with a new simplicity and earnestness. The prayers were not merely read, but prayed by the minister and people all together. The words of Scripture were read, not by a clerical voice, but by a man with natural utterance, with the sincerity of clear insight and genuine conviction, and the preaching touched the hearers' deepest sympathies, kindled aspiration, and was evidently capable of ministering to human needs."

I have travelled widely since that long ago, and listened to many eminent preachers, who were deservedly renowned. I cherish warm regard for some of those I was privileged to hear, and notably Robert Collyer and Phillips Brooks, both splendid men; but I never was so conscious of the reality of religious fellowship or the reality of soul worship as on the occasion mentioned.

That clergyman, I was afterwards informed, belonged to the low-church party. I recognised in him a far higher type of Christian brotherhood, and was sure he was a member of the Church catholic. His name I have forgotten, but the memory of his inspiring services and messages will ever remain fresh and precious in my heart. But why should such memories be rare? The celebrities of the stage, as we are informed in the case of the late Sir Henry Irving, strenuously struggle to cultivate the gifts of utterance and cure themselves of natural defects of speech and gesture, in order that they may win fame, honour, and wealth. They have their reward, and, surely, those who are the servants of the most High, and delight to be bearers of truth and righteousness, have a thousand times more reason for determining to serve Him perfectly. The message they have to deliver is of transcendent, highest, and perennial human interest, ever fresh and soul inspiring in itself. Does it not then become them to resolve—and the younger ministers in particular—that all art, prayer, patient and persistent endeavour can do, they will attempt, in order to become efficient readers, speakers, and preachers in our ministry.

THE ESSEX HALL YEAR BOOK.

Sir,—The secretaries of our congregations will have received by this time the usual request for particulars, to be published in the Essex Hall Year Book. But they will observe that this year, for the first time, they are asked to supply the names and dates of Ministers' Settlements, from about 1875 onwards. May I explain that this new departure is made at the suggestion of the Ministerial Fellowship, a body of our ministers now numbering 126. Looking to the valuable information already tabulated about the record of ministers, it was felt that a similar record about congregations for, say, the last twenty-five years would be equally serviceable. I trust that the secretaries will, therefore, be good enough to supply the Editor as promptly as possible with the needful particulars, carefully checked and tabulated; so that, for historical and practical interest alike, the information about ministers and congregations may be accessible to anyone.

C. J. Street,
Hon. Sec., Ministerial Fellowship.
Sheffield, October 24, 1905.

BETTER THAN ESSEX HALL.

Sir,—On my way to Essex Hall I made one of a great number of people who after the opening ceremony walked along the Kingsway. One idea occurred to me for which I venture to ask publicity. Why should not Essex Hall be sold, and a new, more adequate building be set up in the Kingsway or Aldwych? We all know the inconvenience of Essex Hall. We all dislike it—save for its associations. But we can't live on history. So far as I know, there is not in it a really good room, thoroughly adapted to its purpose. The acoustic properties of the large hall are unsurpassably bad; the committee rooms are beyond measure uncomfortable; the reading-room invites no one. The whole place is unworthy of us, because it is inadequate to our needs. I picture to myself a building beautiful to look upon, with a spacious hall in which many people can freely circulate before or after a meeting, thoroughly well arranged and commodious offices and committee rooms, a reading-room which it would be a pleasure to use, with perhaps a good reference library attached, which should be free to subscribers, and something in the nature of a guest-room in which friends could meet and talk in comfort.

Of course, money would be needed beyond the large sum which would be realised by the sale of the present hall. But, once our imagination were touched, that would be forthcoming. The site is to be had now. In a few years the chance will have gone. At the moment the pick of the new roads might be ours. I wonder if some of our rich men, who believe in our cause and its future, will start a subscription list? Even as an act of faith it would have great value.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bedfield.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, October 22, conducted in the morning by the Rev. W. Birks and in the evening by Mr. R. Newell. The annual tea-meeting was held on the following Tuesday, at which addresses were given by Miss Hill, the Rev. W. Birks, and Mr. Newell.

Birmingham: Old Meeting (Presentation and Welcome Meeting).—To celebrate the twenty-first anniversary of the ministry of the Rev. Joseph Wood, a social meeting was held at the Old Meeting Church on Wednesday evening, Oct. 18, when the opportunity was also taken to welcome Mr. C. M. Wright, B.A., who completed his studies at Manchester College, Oxford, last June, as assistant minister. Mr. W. Cheshire, the senior warden, presided. Warm and affectionate tribute to the value of Mr. Wood's long services was paid by the chairman and by Lieutenant-General Phelps, who presented an illuminated address on behalf of the congregation, together with a large photograph of her husband, for Mrs. Wood. Sir James Smith, who followed, spoke o the value of Mr. Wood's services on the Birmingham School Board, and of what he had done to stimulate the public life of the city. The Rev. James C. Street, speaking on behalf of the churches, said Mr. Wood was always for freedom and righteousness. The Rev. Joseph Wood, in acknowledging the presentation, said there was a tinge of sadness about the gathering, for of the seventeen members of the committee who invited him to the Old Meeting, fourteen had gone over to the majority. He extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Wright, in which the Rev. C. C. Coe joined, having known Mr. Wright and his father for many years in the North. He referred also to his long friendship with Mr. Wood, who, when a Congregational minister at Leicester, had attended his recognition service at the Great Meeting. The Rev. J. J. Wright also spoke, and congratulated his son on entering upon his ministry in association with so experienced and successful a preacher as Mr. Wood. The Rev. J. Worsley Austin having joined in the welcome on behalf of the ministers of the Birmingham district. Mr. Wright replied, with gratitude for all the kind things that had been said, and the hope that he would prove worthy of their confidence. After an interval for refreshments in the upper school-room, a vocal and instrumental concert was given. The meeting was thoroughly successful and was marked by much enthusiasm. Mr. Richard Peyton, Councillor Ernest Martineau, and Mrs. Charles Harding were among those who sent letters of regret for unavoidable absence.

Brighton.—A social meeting was held at Christ Church on Monday evening, Oct. 23, to celebrate the anniversary of the church, when helpful addresses were given by the Rev. J. J. Marten, of Horsham; the Rev. S. Gardner Preston, of Hastings; and the Rev. J. Felstead, of Lewes. Mr. W. Slatter read a statement as to the history of the movement in Brighton. Mr. C. W. Mellor, J.P., was in the chair.

Cambridge.—The first service of the present session was conducted last Sunday morning by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Manchester College, Oxford, when there was a very encouraging attendance.

Derby.—The annual congregational social meeting was held at Friargate Chapel, on Monday evening, October 16. Among the guests of the evening were the Revs. James Harwood and D. J. Williams. After tea a musical programme was rendered, under the direction of Mr. Neville Cox, and during the evening a presentation was made to Mr. and Mrs. Jones from the congregation: to Mr. Jones a gold watch, suitably inscribed, and to his wife a pair of richly decorated candlesticks. Mr. Jones had been for twenty years hon. secretary of the chapel Literary and Musical Society, and both he and Mrs. Jones have rendered great service in the choir. The presentation was made by the Rev. James Harwood, cordially seconded by the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, minister of the chapel. Mr. Kitching and Mr. Mills also spoke, and Mr. Jones, with much feeling, acknowledged the gifts.

Dover.—On October 11 the annual sale of useful clothing was held at Adrian-street Church, in connection with the Ladies' Sewing Guild, all new goods being sold at cost price to benefit the poor.

Framlingham.—Anniversary services were held at the Old Meeting on Sunday, October 22, the preacher being the Rev. W. Birks, and on the following evening the annual tea-meeting was held, followed by an entertainment. Mr. W. Youngman, of Charlsfield Hall, presided, and addresses were given by Miss Taggart and the Revs. W. Birks, L. Tavener, and R. Newell.

Glasgow.—Mr. Leonard J. Russell, son of the Rev. E. T. Russell, has obtained his M.A. degree in Glasgow University, with first-class honours in Mathematics and Natural Philosophy.

London: Essex Church.—To-morrow Oct. 29, the Rev. Dr. Hunter will preach at the evening service (7.0).

London: Peckham (Welcome Meeting).—On Tuesday evening, October 17, a meeting was held to welcome the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher as minister of Avondale-road Church. The chair was taken by Mr. H. Epps, President of the L.D.U.S. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie made a powerful appeal for a bold declaration of principles and hearty co-operation of the members of the church with their minister. The Rev. G. Hooper, minister of a neighbouring Free Methodist church, joined in the welcome, and was followed by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, on behalf of the London ministers. The Rev. G. Carter, former minister of the church, and Mr. W. J. Cooley, the secretary, next spoke, and Mr. Fletcher responded. The Rev. A. Hurn, of Acton, a fellow student of Mr. Fletcher's, and Mr. David Martineau also added their good wishes, and a most encouraging meeting was brought to a close with the Benediction. The choir of the Wandsworth Church furnished music for the meeting.

London: Stratford.—On Monday, Oct. 16, the Band of Hope opened its autumn session with a tea, at which many members and friends (including the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, W. H. Rose, and Mr. A. W. Harris), were present. After tea twenty-five of the junior members gave a performance of an original fairy cantata—"The Midsummer Moon." The play was repeated on Wednesday, Oct. 18, and preceded by a concert of original compositions by members of the Temperance Guild and Young People's Guild, which proved very interesting.

London: Wood-green.—Anniversary services were held last Sunday, and were attended by large congregations. The Rev. Dr. Mummery, who has been minister of the church since its establishment in 1891, preached in the morning on "Devotion." In the evening there was a special musical service, the preacher being the Rev. V. D. Davis, whose subject was "The Manhood of Jesus." This was one of a series of "Forward Movement" discourses. To-morrow, being "Citizen Sunday," Dr. Mummery is to preach in the morning on "Trade and Commerce," and in the evening on "Principles of our Faith."

Malton.—On the occasion of the Harvest Thanksgiving services on Sunday, October 8, the Rev. W. R. Smyth preached his farewell sermon, and on Monday, after a lecture by Mr. Smyth, the Rev. John Ellis, who was in the chair, spoke some words of sympathetic farewell, regretting that the Yorkshire Union could not maintain a resident minister at Malton. The Rev. J. S. Mathers, whose father was a native of the district, will conduct the services on alternate Sundays for a time.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at Boston Mills Schools, Hyde, on Saturday, Oct. 21 About 120 persons were present from the various schools of the Union. Mrs. Dowson, the President, occupied the chair. The reports of the treasurer and secretary were read and adopted and the officers elected. Rev. W. Holmshaw, of Blackley, read a most interesting paper on "The Sunday-school and Social Questions." A discussion followed, taken part in by Revs. H. Bodell Smith and B. C. Constable, and Messrs. J. Thompson and R. Firth. Train arrangements caused an early closure, and Mr. Holmshaw briefly replied. Several musical items were given by Boston Mills friends and the Singing Class, whose efforts were greatly appreciated. Cordial votes of thanks were accorded to the reader of the paper, to the Boston Mills friends, and to the President, and duly responded to.

Nottage.—At the harvest service on Tuesday evening the lessons were read by the Rev. W. J. Phillips, and prayer was offered by the Rev. B. C. Davies, a Baptist minister. The Rev. D. Evans, a Congregational minister, gave a brief address in Welsh, and the Rev. D. Rees preached the sermon.

Rochdale.—The Monthly Messenger of the congregation has entered with October on its twentieth year. Principal Gordon's Martineau Memorial Sermon, preached at the unveiling of the tablet, is now on sale at the church.

Stockton.—The church has sustained a great loss by the death of Mrs. E. C. Walton, widow of the late Alderman Walton, who was Mayor of the Borough in 1895-6. Mrs. Walton was a member of the church from her earliest days, and was a devoted Sunday-school teacher, and for many years gave voluntary service as church organist. She was an active member of the church committee, and was always a leader on ladies' committees, and in every way ready to the last to support every movement in connection with the church she loved so well.

Stockton.—The 217th anniversary of this church was celebrated on Oct. 22 and 23. The occasion was more than usually important, the opportunity being taken to induct the new minister of the church, the Rev. Reginald H. Maister. Sermons were preached on the 22nd inst. by the Rev. Alexander R. Andreae, of Gee Cross, who gave the right hand of fellowship to Mr. Maister at the morning service. A largely-attended and very successful conversazione was held on the 23rd inst., when the Mayor of Stockton, Mr. E. Brown, J.P., presided, and expressed his pleasure in taking part. An address of welcome to the new minister was given by Mr. C. Bowes on behalf of the Church, and Mr. Maister responded in a feeling manner. The Rev. A. R. Andreae gave an excellent speech, and read a cordial letter addressed to the congregation by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, who has taken a lively interest in Mr. Maister's settlement. Letters were also read from the Revs. Dendy Agate, H. Cross, and others. Some hearty speeches followed from the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, W. E. Mellone, of Warrenpoint, and C. Green, Congregational minister. Refreshments and music concluded an extremely pleasant evening.

Trowbridge.—A bazaar in aid of the funds of Conigre Chapel was held in the Town Hall on Wednesday and Thursday, October 18 and 19. The bazaar, which was arranged on the plan of a winter garden, was opened on the first day by Miss Worsley, of Bristol, the Rev. Joseph Wain presiding. Miss Worsley had been associated with Mr. Wain in the work of the Bristol Domestic Mission, and expressed her pleasure at being present, and at the reports which had reached them of the good progress of Mr. Wain's work in Trowbridge. On the second day Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, M.P., opened the bazaar, and gave an address on Unitarianism, to which further reference will be found in another column. Three local Baptist ministers, a Congregational, and a Wesleyan minister took part in the opening proceedings on the two days. The Rev. A. J. Brinkworth was also present. The proceeds amounted to upwards of £110.

Whitchurch (Resignation).—The Rev. C. D. Badland has resigned the pulpit of the Church of the Saviour, and is leaving to reside at Kidderminster for private and family reasons. The resignation has been accepted with regret.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to give a course of five lectures on Plays of Shakespeare in the Stopford Brooke Lectureship at University College. The first lecture on Two Gentlemen of Verona is to be given on Thursday, Nov. 9, in the Botanical Theatre, at 8 o'clock. Othello, Henry V., Troilus and Cressida, and Anthony and Cleopatra are the other plays to be dealt with. Tickets for the course 7s., to teachers (naming their schools) 5s., can be had from the Secretary of the Lectures at University College.

AN astonishing variety of picture post cards is published by Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, some simply vulgar and silly, but a great many in the "Wide-Wide World" series really beautiful. The purpose of this note is to call the special attention of Sunday-school teachers and others to four packets, each with six cards, on the Holy Land (Nos. 7308-9-10-11). The first two sets are of Jerusalem, and both are very striking. No. 7310 represents other places, including a view of the Lake of Galilee. The cards in No. 7311 illustrate the life of the people. The sets cost sixpence each, and will be found very useful for illustrating lessons.

ETHICAL RELIGION SOCIETY, STEINWAY HALL, PORTMAN SQ., W.—Oct. 29, at 11.15, DR. WASHINGTON SULLIVAN, "Money Lenders and the Ethics of Usury."

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

Chairman.—Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.
Vice-Chairman.—Mr. G. H. LEIGH.

THE Mission Committee appeal to the generosity of friends of religious work among the poor.

They have been obliged to decide upon the extension of their premises at Willert-street and Renshaw-street on account of the constantly increasing work at the two Missions. They propose to enlarge the buildings at Willert-street at a cost of about £1,200 (the necessary land has been bought), and those at Renshaw-street at a cost of about £1,500 (part of this scheme has already been completed).

Owing to the increasing demands upon the funds of the society, and the loss of old and generous friends and subscribers, there is an annual deficit of more than £150. The Committee wish to pay off the existing debt, and to provide a sum for future needs. For these objects they require at least £3,500.

They acknowledge with gratitude the following donations :—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DR. JAMES DRUMMOND, who has been since 1869 New Testament Professor in Manchester College (now at Oxford), and since 1885, when he succeeded the late Dr. Martineau, Principal of the College, has resigned those offices, and the resignation is to take effect in June next, at the close of the present session. Dr. Drummond celebrated in May his seventieth birthday, and has well earned release from administrative duties and the strain of constant lecturing. Of what his old students and the wide circle of his friends will hope from those years of studious leisure, on which he will enter after next midsummer, we have attempted to speak further in our leading article.

ON Easter Sunday a marble tablet with an admirable portrait to the memory of James Martineau was dedicated in the Blackwater-street Chapel, Rochdale, at the opening of which, on Thursday, June 11, 1857, he was the preacher. The sermon on "The offering of Art to Worship," is in the second volume of his Hours of Thought. The memorial tablet, as we recorded at the time, was the gift of Mr. Richard Heape. The address, given by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Home Missionary College, at the unveiling of the tablet, is printed, and may be had from Mr. F. Fitton, 11, Thrush-street, Rochdale, or at the Book-room, Essex Hall, 2½d. by post. The proceeds go to the church funds.

"JAMES MARTINEAU," said Mr. Gordon in that address, "is ours; but not ours only. He belongs to, and is claimed by, a wider fellowship than any we can offer. He is one with the loftier minds, the kindling spirits, of all time. The appreciation of him has extended far beyond our insular limits. If somewhat slow to cross the Channel, it reached the point of enthusiasm beyond the broad Atlantic earlier than here. More significant still is the value set upon Martineau's writings by those whose religious associations and ecclesiastical allegiance are far removed from ours and his. Perhaps these even study him more than we do. I am not sure that Unitarians know their own great writers as they might. I am not sure that Unitarians did not first learn the full value of Martineau when they found how high was the estimate in which others held him. It will be no mean benefit of this centennial, if it leads many of us to renewed and extended personal acquaintance with the mind which produced the Endeavours and the Hours of Thought."

AFTER speaking of Dr. Martineau's ideal of Church fellowship and his efforts for comprehension, the address concluded:—"Assuredly such a character as his, whose countenance henceforth from year to year shall draw the wondering eyes of your children, leaves upon us a strong impression of real greatness. Great was he in work; great was he likewise in faith. The old antithesis of faith and works is here resolved; for in him they are conjoined. We cannot appropriate, with any personal claim, the worth and virtues of our great ones gone. Nor can we rest in them; as if thought had reached finality, and all things had been done. The work of him we honour is not yet ended; his faith has not given forth its closing word. With feebler powers, and yet, it may be, with larger opportunities, we may take this great example as a moving force of our own endeavour. Filled with new ardour for our duty, we may say again on this day of commemoration, as those said, as they turned back from Emmaus—He has vanished from our sight, yet not before he caused our hearts to burn within us, as he went with us on the way, and opened for us the treasure-house of God."

Is the Czar's army to be relied on? This is Russia's momentous question, now that its unalterable wrath breaks forth into widespread action. The insurrectionary movement is of such a nature as to suggest some master mind or some great collective mind, and this may indeed rouse hope or rouse fear in the beholder. But for the moment, what is its force? We hear of a provision of 60,000 or 70,000 rifles mostly of an obsolete pattern. They are little against the largest army in Europe. And here we must fall back on rumour. Well, the reports increase in number and in precision as to the refusal of troops, here a company or two, there a battalion or two, to march against their brothers. We even hear of Cossacks refusing to charge. On the whole these rumours are not to be ignored, and the friends of freedom may rejoice at these growing indications of the unreliability of the army. Certainly the Government has cause to tremble.

To this state of fear we may surely attribute the report of vessels kept under steam for an Imperial flight, and the appearance of the latest of the Czar's manifestos. This document has been hailed with delight in some quarters, but we cannot but ask, Will this be as delusive as its predecessors? The appeals to the grace of God, or the supreme duty of a sovereign mission, are hardly likely to impress with confidence nations which have witnessed the promulgation of so many similar Imperial rescripts. This latest essay declares the immutable foundation of civic liberty, and promises that no law shall "come into force without the authority of the State Duma." No law! but Russia is not ruled by law. Such law as exists is at the discretion of every bureaucrat, and may be suspended or violated at the arbitrary decree of officials who are received into and discharged from favour at every imperial whim. And the abolition of this illegal administration is not even foreshadowed. How little able, again, is the author of the manifesto to read the signs of the time. "It is impossible that society should desire the dismemberment of the empire." What answer have Finland, Poland, and other provinces to give? That is exactly the issue. The empire as it exists to-day, the people of many classes would so alter, so break up, and so refashion, as in very fact to dismember. So far from the Czar being ready to yield to the wishes of his people, this latest rescript shows that he does not yet even comprehend them.

ALL liberty is perilous, as the despot truly affirms, but who would therefore seek shelter under a despot's throne?—Channing.

COUNCIL MEETING.

THE Council met at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, October 25. There were present:—Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter (in the chair), Rev. Frederic Allen, Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Mr. G. W. Brown, Miss Burkitt, Rev. G. Carter, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. G. H. Clennell, Miss Clephan, Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. Hahnemann Epps, Rev. Charles Hargrove, Mr. John Harrison, Rev. James Harwood, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. David Martineau, Rev. J. McDowell, Mrs. Francis Morton, Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. F. Pinnock, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, Mr. Frank Preston, Miss Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. H. Rawlings, Miss Emily Sharpe, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Mr. William Spiller, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Rev. C. J. Street, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Miss Teschemacher, Rev. E. Turland, Sir R. K. Wilson, Rev. W. Wooding, and the Secretary.

Miss M. B. Westenholz, a foreign correspondent of the Association, who was passing through London on her way home to Denmark, was also present.

The Secretary announced that the President, Mr. C. F. Pearson, had written to say that yesterday he was unfortunately ill in bed, and a telegram which had just arrived announced that he was much better, but still unable to attend. Letters were also submitted from Mr. W. B. Bowring, of Liverpool; Mr. William Long, of Warrington; Mrs. Berry, of Wrotham; Miss Lucas, of Darlington; Mr. J. Harrop White, of Mansfield, and others, regretting their inability to be present at the meeting of the Council. On the motion of Rev. W. G. Tarrant the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., was voted to take the chair.

The Minutes of the Council Meeting of March 29 were read and confirmed, and the Secretary then read the Report of the Executive Committee as follows:—

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

Owing to the mass of detailed business which comes before the Association, it is necessary to have it sifted and considered by various Sub-Committees before the full Committee are called upon to give their decision. The Sub-Committees, with their chairmen for the year, have been appointed as follows:—Finance, Mr. H. B. Lawford; Publications, Rev. W. G. Tarrant; Home Mission, Rev. Henry Gow; Foreign Mission, Rev. Charles Hargrove; Scottish, Rev. James Harwood; General Purposes, Rev. F. W. Stanley; Civil Rights, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. The Executive Committee meet on the second Wednesday of the month and the Sub-Committees a week earlier; it is important, therefore, that all correspondence requiring the attention of the Committee should reach the secretary by the first day of the month.

THE TREASURER'S REPORT.

The income for the nine months ending September 30 amounted to £6,301. Subscriptions yielded £3,901; investments, £975; donations and collections, £233; book department, £1,173; miscellaneous receipts, £19. The expenditure for the same period amounted to £5,170. Home and foreign grants required £3,241; printing and binding books and tracts, £1,114; maintenance, office, and anniversary expenses, £209; salaries of book-room and office staff, £606. The balance of £1,131, shown on September 30, will all disappear when the grants, accounts, and expenses to which the Association is already pledged have been paid.

The Treasurer has made an appeal to the churches to respond liberally on Association Sunday, November 19, when collections will be made by a large and, it is hoped, increased number of congregations, so that he may possess ample funds to meet the many claims which are sure to arise before the year is out. The opportunity afforded by Association Sunday in calling attention to the varied missionary work of the Committee at home and abroad on behalf of the principles and faith of Unitarians is one which ought to commend itself to all our ministers and congregations.

The subscription list, upon which the stability and usefulness of the Association so largely depends, has suffered serious loss by the death of many generous supporters. Nearly one hundred members of the Association have died during the last eighteen months, and the loss of their subscriptions amounts to £250. In addition to these, several subscribers of large sums promised their help for a period of three years in order to secure to the Association a munificent subscription of £1,000 a year. Unless other subscribers come forward it will not be possible to secure this subscription beyond the present year.

PUBLICATIONS.

The increased resources placed at the disposal of the Committee have enabled them to print and publish a larger number and variety of books and tracts than during any previous period in the history of the Association. The sixpenny reprints of "God and the Soul," by Mr. Armstrong; "The First Three Gospels," by Mr. Carpenter; "The Soul," by F. W. Newman; "The Passing and Permanent in Religion," by Dr. Savage, have had a large sale; and if ministers and secretaries of congregations would occasionally direct attention to these and similar publications, the sales might easily be increased tenfold. Through the courtesy of the Hibbert Trustees an abridged edition of Dr. Charles Beard's lectures on "The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its relation to Modern Thought" will be added shortly to the series of sixpenny reprints. A new edition of the popular volume, "The Bible: What it is and is not," by Rev. Joseph Wood, is in the press, and will be published about the middle of December. A revised translation of Dr. Albert Réville's valuable "History of the Dogma of the Deity of Jesus Christ" has recently been issued, and is warmly commended to the notice of the Council. The admirable lecture by Professor Henry Jones, "The Immortality of the Soul in the Poems of Tennyson and Browning," delivered at Essex Hall last Whitsuntide, has been published in an attractive form, and has already secured a large circulation. It is gratifying to report that a second issue of Mr. Carpenter's important Study of Dr. Martineau as Theologian and Teacher has been called for, and opportunity was taken to add an index. In addition to the volume of intellectual and inspiring lectures by the late Mr. Armstrong on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," the Committee are glad to announce that there will shortly be published a volume containing a biography of Mr. Armstrong, prepared by his eldest son, along with a selection of his sermons. The first series of twelve sermons by Unitarian ministers and two numbers of the second series have been issued. The sermons are devotional and practical, not controversial; they are representative of present-day preaching by Unitarian ministers. Many of the tracts published by the Association have a very large circulation, especially those which give direct and simple expositions of Unitarian Christianity; the more popular ones are now being issued in better type and in a more attractive style; it is intended that this new series will gradually take the place of the old series of "Tracts for the Times," "Pages for Religious Inquirers," and "Unitarian Leaflets." Among new essays now in the press which will be read with interest are "The Miraculous in Christianity," by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College; "Giordano Bruno," by Mr. Maurice Adams; and "James Martineau and Francis William Newman as Religious Teachers," by Dr. S. H. Mellone.

Since the meeting of the Council on March 29, grants of 1,012 books and 33,745 tracts, to the value of £141, have been made to ministers, congregations, postal missions, and in response to personal applications. Among the latter were 37 ministers belonging to so-called "orthodox" denominations. Grants of 1,312 books and 11,898 tracts, to the value of £108, were made to applicants in India, Australasia, and other lands outside the British Isles.

HOME MISSION WORK.

A large proportion of the time of the Committee is occupied in considering applications for grants from congregations up and down the country. Of late there has been a tendency to make applications for aid to enable congregations to do small things which it might be expected they could do themselves, or for which they could at least obtain the necessary money in their own immediate localities. The Association has never aspired to be a universal provider of funds for every good work undertaken by Unitarian churches; and the Committee desire to see such a strengthening of local and district organisations as will render it unnecessary to apply to the Association for small grants to enable congregations to do what may be called their ordinary work; and so leave the resources of the Association to be applied for the furtherance of that large and growing field of Unitarian work which individual congregations could not possibly undertake.

In addition to the annual grants made towards the salaries of ministers for 1905, reported at the last meeting of the Council, there are the following:—Acton, £35; Ashton, £70; Heaton Moor and Urmston, £50; Oldham-road, Manchester, £35:

Peckham, £30. These grants are payable from the date of the appointment of the minister. For pulpit supplies, alterations, and repairs to buildings, and for the erection of new churches and schoolrooms, the following grants have been voted :—Aberdare, £5; Carlisle, £10; High Peak Chapels, £10; Hollymount, £10; Nelson, £20; Newport (Mon.), £10; Southampton, £10; Killinchy, £20; Lye, £25; Shirebrook, £20; Attercliffe, £50; Newchurch, £50; Pontypridd, £50 (with a second £50 when £1,000 is raised); Preston, £25.

Arrangements have been made for the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter to deliver his course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" at Birmingham, beginning on Tuesday, October 31. Mr. Carpenter will also give two lectures on "The Gospels and How to Read Them," at Bridport, Exeter, Ilminster, Plymouth, Taunton, and Torquay. The Committee are persuaded of the great educational value of these lectures, and they trust that every possible effort will be made to secure large audiences at the various towns. The delivery of further courses of lectures is receiving the careful consideration of the Committee.

In response to applications from congregations and district societies, preachers have been sent by the Association to conduct special services and deliver week evening lectures at several places. Two or three very busy ministers are much run after, and it would be well if congregations occasionally sought the services of younger and less widely known men. The religious services at Cambridge for the present term were re-opened by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on October 15, when there was an attendance of forty-four students and others. At the annual meeting of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society it was determined to try a series of services at Newport (Mon.), and the meetings already held give promise of arousing interest and proving successful. The question of appointing a district minister in connection with the Southern Unitarian Association who should be stationed at Southamption, with duties at other centres, is receiving attention, but no decision has yet been reached locally. The Committee have been represented at the annual meetings of the Eastern, the Western, and the Yorkshire Unions, the Northumberland and Durham, and the North Midland Associations: these opportunities for conference and interchange of ideas are always welcome.

The difficulty experienced by several congregations in obtaining the services of just the kind of minister they want may be said to be "always with us"; it is a difficulty which frequently bewilders the Committee, and the solution of which is by no means clear. The salary offered is generally small, the attainments required are considerable, and there is a dearth of men of ability and who are prepared to undertake the work on the pittance which is all that some congregations, aided by grants, can afford to give. In the case of a new movement in a large centre of population, where there is a genuine chance of self-support after a few years, it is legitimate to make a large grant in aid of the work; but where there are only twenty or thirty regular worshippers whose annual contributions do not average twenty shillings each, with little or no real prospect of an increase in the congregation, the missionary resources of the Association are not equal to the continuous strain of providing an adequate salary for a minister, nor is there work in such a limited sphere to occupy his whole time. By the exercise of thought and care some means could surely be devised for supplying the religious needs of such congregations without going to the expense of a settled minister.

It is true that not only are there congregations seeking ministers, there are also ministers seeking congregations. There are several men who have not been engaged in the regular work of the ministry for many months, and who find it exceedingly difficult to obtain a suitable settlement. "The denomination" (whatever that may mean) is sometimes blamed for its neglect. There is probably no one to blame; and if congregations occasionally pass over men educated in our own colleges in favour of men who seem to them to possess more attractive gifts, the trials of congregationalism have to be accepted if its privileges are to be enjoyed.

McQUAKER TRUST.

The Committee, as trustees of the McQuaker Fund, endeavour to assist in the maintenance and diffusion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity from the resources at their disposal so as to keep alive in Scotland the spirit of independence and self-help. Although they have not been altogether unsuccessful in their effort, the Trustees would welcome an increase of missionary enterprise and zeal among Unitarians throughout Scotland, such as they found exhibited at Aberdeen in connection with the laying of the memorial stone of the new church on September 30, when the proceedings were characterised by faith in and enthusiasm for a living religious movement destined to enlighten and bless mankind. At Aberdeen a conference was held of ministers and delegates of the Unitarian Churches in Scotland, at which several topics of interest were discussed and suggestions made for the consideration of the McQuaker trustees. The chairman of the Scottish sub-committee, accompanied by the secretary, personally visited Kilmarnock, Kirkcaldy, and Dundee, and conferred with representatives of the congregations respecting their position and work. At Kilmarnock a little progress has been made, but the congregation are at present perplexed by a resolution of the owners of the church (the Scottish Unitarian Association) to dispose of the property. At Kirkcaldy it has not yet been found possible to secure the services of a minister whom the congregation would like to have; but hopes are entertained that the offer of an increased grant towards the salary of an approved minister may lead to some useful result in the near future. At Dundee there are urgent repairs to the buildings required, and the McQuaker Trustees have promised a liberal grant towards the cost, provided the congregation and their friends do their share. Arrangements have been made for the delivery of lectures expository of Unitarian Christianity, for the interchange of pulpits, for occasional special services and lectures by ministers from England, for the preparation of an additional series of Unitarian tracts suitable for present-day needs in Scotland, and for the development of postal mission work. It is to be regretted that the experiment of providing for the training of a McQuaker student for the Unitarian ministry in Scotland has not succeeded in its main object. The one vacant pulpit does not seem to offer a congenial sphere of work for Mr. Ewart, and there is no other opening at present.

FOREIGN MISSION WORK.

The meetings of the International Council, held at Geneva at the end of August, were full of interest and inspiration; no one who shared in the proceedings could fail to be deeply impressed by what took place. The city in which the Council met, the courtesy of the Cathedral and University authorities in providing accommodation for the services and meetings, and of the Municipality for the conversazione, the unstinted kindness and unwearying labours of Professor Montet and the local committee, the high tone and generous spirit reflected in the papers read by so many able and distinguished men—these gave a dignity and impetus to the Council for which its founders and friends are profoundly grateful. The days spent at Geneva were indeed red-letter days in the history of the liberal movement in religion; they helped to lift men out of their smallness into contact with a large and glowing life of devotion to truth, freedom, progress, and fellowship in religion. The eager, sympathetic part which the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had taken in promoting the ideals and work of the International Council was warmly acknowledged at Geneva. There were 230 Unitarians from Great Britain and Ireland enrolled as members or representatives at the international meetings, and although several were evidently "on holiday," the attendances throughout an exceedingly full and busy week were large and enthusiastic. Opportunity will be taken later this afternoon to give public expression to the appreciation and gratitude of the Council by some of the delegates who were present; and also to convey to the American Unitarian Association an earnest pledge that the Council will do its utmost to secure the attendance of a large representation from Great Britain and Ireland in the autumn of 1907, when it is proposed to hold the meetings in Boston, the historic headquarters of American Unitarianism.

In connection with the churches in Australia, an effort is being made to strengthen the bonds of sympathy between them, and to increase their effectiveness as centres of missionary work. The great distances which separate them renders interchange and co-operation exceedingly difficult. Towards the support of the Unitarian services and work at Hobart, Tasmania, a grant of £25 has been made. Aid has been promised to the congregation at Sydney to help in extinguishing the debt on the church. At Wellington, New Zealand, there is a most favourable opportunity of founding a Unitarian Church; the people themselves have already promised to subscribe generously; they are only waiting for an able and capable minister to lead and guide the movement. The Committee are hopeful of securing at an early date the services of a minister eminently suitable for the important work at Wellington.

Mr. Haugerud reports that the congregation at Christiania is making good progress. The Sunday services are regularly attended by about 150 people, and there is every hope of establishing a self-supporting church in the course of a few years. Besides the grant of £50 for the minister's salary, £10 has been voted towards the cost of printing Unitarian tracts and lessons for young people in the Norwegian language.

Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D., and his wife made themselves very useful, while in Germany, in extending a knowledge of Unitarian Christianity among University students and others. Dr. Brooke Herford's "Brief Account of Unitarianism" and Mr. Sunderland's "Larger Meaning of Unitarianism" have been translated into German, and a number of copies have already been circulated among inquirers. Rev. G. von Petzold, as the representative of the Association, attended an important Conference of "The Friends of the Christian World" at Goslar in June, and presented an interesting report showing the progress that was taking place in liberal religious thought in Germany.

It is a pleasure to the Committee to report that Mr. Charles Raffay, the new Hungarian student, is now studying at Manchester College, Oxford. He comes warmly recommended by Bishop Ferencz and Professor Boros.

From India many applications still come for Unitarian literature, and at Allahabad, Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras there are active agencies for its dissemination. The death of Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar is a heavy loss to the cause of liberal religion in India; and an expression of appreciation and sympathy was sent to the Brahmo Somajes by the Committee of the Association. The mission work in the Khasi Hills is proceeding on more satisfactory lines. Rev. David Edwards and other workers are now able to exert some genuine moral and religious influence upon the people among whom they labour. Mr. Chakrabarti is also receiving cordial support in his attempt to reorganise the management of the Unitarian mission stations, notwithstanding the difficulties he has to contend against.

DECEASED MEMBERS.

Since the last meeting of the Council death has removed many valued members and supporters of the Association. Mention may here be made of Mr. John Edward Taylor of London (proprietor of the Manchester Guardian); Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough; Rev. Iden Payne, of Stannington; Mr. T. Birchall, of Warrington; Mr. George Brothers, of Canterbury; Mrs. Greenhow, of Leeds; Mr. John Warren, of London; Mr. John Warren, of Nottingham; and Mr. Donald Wilson, of Hull. To these the name of the Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Moneyrea, who died last Sunday, must now regretfully be added. To the relatives and friends of the departed the Committee desire to convey through the Council their respectful sympathy in the sorrow and loss which have befallen them.

Questions on the Report being invited, the Rev. E. TURLAND referred to the Unitarian Mission in Japan, which had formerly been under the care of the American Unitarian Association, but was now an independent native movement. He said it would be of great interest to have information as to the progress of the work.

The CHAIRMAN said that they did have news of the work in Japan, and he recently received a letter from Mr. Yoshimoto, who had been obliged to leave Manchester College, Oxford, through the failure of his health, which was now happily restored. He expected much of Mr. Yoshimoto, who had already written two books, and was hoping soon to be at Tokyo, doing practical religious work. Regular services were held in the Unity Hall, conducted chiefly by professional men.

Miss SHARPE spoke of the need for religious work in villages, and mention was made of the possibilities of a Van Mission. The Rev. C. HARGROVE said he thought this "Church of the Unattached," of which they had heard from America, seemed just to meet the need.

The Rev. C. J. STREET mentioned what the "Ministerial Fellowship" was doing to bring together ministers in need of settlement and congregations in need of a minister. Mr. STANNUS recognised the need, but thought it would be best met by a committee of that association.

The CHAIRMAN said there certainly was a desire for more co-operation in our religious work. What form it could best take he did not yet know, but it was very interesting to hear of the efforts that were being made. He then moved the adoption of the report, and spoke of the large operations to which it bore witness, and the continuous thought given to carrying them out. He earnestly trusted that subscriptions would be maintained, so that the present standard of income and of work should not suffer decline. He pointed out what admirable work ministers might do by bringing the sixpenny reprints before the people. Such a book as Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," ought to be in every household. The circulation of such literature was simply a matter of taking trouble.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON seconded, and the report was received.

The CHAIRMAN then offered a cordial welcome to Miss Westenholz, whose acquaintance they had been delighted to make at the first International meeting in London, and had met again at Amsterdam, and were always glad to see. With a word of grateful thanks, Miss Westenholtz acknowledged the greeting.

Mr. W. ARTHUR SHARPE moved:—"That the members of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association send to Professor Montet and the local Committee their warm congratulations on the success which attended the recent meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers and workers at Geneva, and an expression of their sincere gratitude for the notable service rendered by the meetings to the cause of liberal religion in many lands." He spoke warmly of the hospitality offered to the Council by the Municipality, the University, and the Church authorities, which was a remarkable sign of the progress of liberalism. No one could be at those meetings without being impressed by the unity of spirit that prevailed. It was notably seen in the three cathedral sermons by men of different nationalities. When they came back from their evening trip on the lake, and the Cathedral towers were lighted up in their honour, it appeared to him as an emblem of some new light that was dawning in the religious world. Those meetings had done something to spread that light, and future meetings would carry it still further for the establishment of the Church Universal.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE seconded, and said he felt more and more grateful for what those meetings had been to them. He had been struck by the fact that they as Unitarians had been received in Geneva not as people to be tolerated, because others were so large-minded as to receive even them; they were welcomed not as strangers but as friends. The pilgrimage to the Monument of Servetus seemed to him of peculiar significance. It was something like an event in history, that there, on the very spot where Servetus had been burnt, while practically all Christendom approved, they had been able to assemble as they did in honour of the victim.

The CHAIRMAN said their reception at Geneva was the more remarkable because the majority of the consistory of the Church, of whom twenty-five out of thirty-one were laymen, were now orthodox. But thirty years ago all religious tests had been abolished in Geneva, and they had so thoroughly learnt the lesson of freedom that the orthodox joined cordially with the liberals in making their reception what it was. It was a great strength to the Council that Prof. Harnack's name and others appeared among their adherents, and it was a notable fact that more than one Roman Catholic priest had taken part with them. The congress was becoming of increasing importance.

The resolution having been cordially passed, Mr. SHARPE moved, and Rev. W. WOODING seconded, a special vote of thanks to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie for the great help he had given in securing the success of the meetings, and this was carried by acclamation.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT moved:—"That the members of the Council have learned with great interest and pleasure that the American Unitarian Association has invited the International Council to hold its next series of meetings in Boston in 1907, and they desire to assure Dr. Samuel A. Eliot and his fellow-workers of the hearty sympathy of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in the effort to make the meetings in America another memorable landmark in the history of a free and progressive religious faith." He referred to the suggestion made by Dr. Herbert Smith at the recent Provincial Assembly meeting, to the fact that ministers would be greatly benefited if they were enabled to attend the next meeting in Boston, and he agreed that it would be so, and it would be very good for their congregations.

Mr ION PRITCHARD seconded, and spoke of the great support given by their American brethren to that movement. They, for their part, should do their best to secure the success of the Boston meeting, and certainly they could be assured of a very cordial welcome.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU having proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the meeting terminated.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. RICHARD LYTTLE.

As announced in our last issue, the Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Moneyrea, died at the residence of his friends Mr. and Mrs. J. Swann, "Lisnagarvey," Bristol, on October 22. Mr. Swann being himself unable to leave his room, Mrs. Swann accompanied the remains to Ireland. With her were the Revs. Charles Peach and T. P. Spedding (friends and fellow-students of the deceased), Mr. W. R. McWilliam (a cousin), Mr. T. Munn (a Moneyrea student at the H.M.C.), and Mr. Lewis (Shrewsbury). On the arrival of the boat at Belfast, there were early indications of the widespread sympathy which had been aroused. The Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., came on board at once to receive the mourners, and soon after followed deputations from many societies bearing wreaths, as well as great numbers of private friends and fellow-workers of the deceased. Among the many wreaths the tribute sent by the Ulster Farmers' Association was most conspicuous and sadly significant, taking the form of a large Irish harp with broken strings.

Mr. Lyttle had left instructions in his will that he should be buried at Moneyrea, and at ten o'clock a procession was formed, and moved in that direction. Catholic priests, clergy of all denominations, members of Parliament, doctors, barristers, magistrates, farmers, labourers, men of all classes fell in and formed one vast, quiet, orderly procession. Belfast showed a noble side of its character in the universal sympathy everywhere displayed, and rarely indeed has it been lifted so high above its ancient feuds as in its tribute to a man loved and honoured of all parties. The procession was a never-to-be-forgotten sight. Men of all sects and parties marched side by side, passers-by reverently bared their heads, factories ceased working as the cortège passed, school children stood lined up in front of their buildings, all vehicular and tramway traffic was stopped, and thus the great procession marched on, steadily breasting the long hills of their seven-mile march—a wonderful tribute to the character of a man who could thus weld so vast a concourse into one bond of reverent sympathy. Arrived at Moneyrea, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., conducted the service, and the Rev. Charles Peach delivered a brief address. Of the feeling aroused in the Moneyrea district itself no adequate description can be given. There was sorrow in every home. Everywhere men greeted each other with the local expression, "We have met with a loss." Meetings were postponed, football matches abandoned. There was no heart in the country for either work or play. It was not one Congregation or one Party, but a whole vast countryside mourning the loss of a true and trusted friend.

On the Sunday following the funeral a Memorial Service was held at Moneyrea. There was a very large congregation, and many of those present were deeply affected by the solemnity of the service, which was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of Belfast. The pulpit was draped in black, and around the rostrum there were suspended a number of beautiful wreaths. The opening hymn was "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and afterwards "Lead, Kindly Light" was sung.

In his address the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND said their departed friend was full of enjoyment of his work and his friends, and of all the gladness of the world. But, above all, he was ever pressing forward with restless energy—with energy that was harmonised and controlled by the consciousness of an aim which bound all the departments of his work into one, and made them part of his service to God. His public work was singularly high-minded and free from selfish ambition. He did not seek any praise or honour for himself. All his work was done for what he believed to be a righteous cause. He believed that the public movements in which he was interested were means for making men happier and better, and, whether they agreed with him or not, they knew that for him they formed part of the plan of campaign of the kingdom of God. He was, first and foremost, the Christian minister, devoted to the work of preaching and teaching his people. Those of them who looked at his work from a distance were astonished at their late pastor's remarkable industry and the patience which he displayed. Perhaps what struck them most was the success which he achieved in his dealings with young men. The young men who were present at that service knew what it had meant to them to have such a comrade and friend. They knew how free he was from professional manner and from the professional cant of religious speech. He believed in living the good life, and in helping others to live it, in the strength of the love of God and the grace of Jesus Christ. Perhaps some of them were thinking of the best memorial that could be raised to him. Well, the best memorial of a minister was in the lives of his people, when he had gone away.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, who followed, said: "The great demonstration of affection and esteem last Wednesday marked the profound sense of the great loss which has befallen the whole of this country-side. It is not necessary for me to emphasise that loss. It will come home to you more and more as the days pass. Sorrows will come, and you will miss an accustomed sympathy upon which you had grown to rely; difficulties will arise, and you will look in vain for the old guiding hand. Gradually it will come upon you in unexpected ways, startling you into a new wonder at the large place left vacant, enlarging your sorrow by a truer estimate of its intimacy with all your life. Underneath our friend's tireless activity there was a serene constancy of soul which no sudden demand of pity or danger could startle in unreadiness. He was always ready, armed and prepared, to counsel or to help, because to counsel and help was the native quality of his soul. It was not the product of a creed or a plan, it was not the hardly won assurance of passion disciplined and will conquered, it was the native speech of his soul, the natural expression of his real self. His life was as simple as that of a child, his heart was as pure as the sunshine. To do good was with him more than a creed, more than a duty; it was a joy and a delight, because it was just to be himself. And with all his learning he never unlearned that. Disappointment left no corrosive sting in his soul; failure checked none of his hopes; in absolute simplicity and perfect trust he went on loving and helping, right to the end."

After dwelling on the blessedness of divine comfort in their mourning, he continued: "He has passed on from our sight, but he lives in our lives. Let us not sorrow as those who have room for complaint; let us thank God we had such a friend, and that He opened our eyes to see his worth. Life will be harder without him—how much harder, we shall learn day by day. But how much harder would it have been if we had never known him? We are better men for having known him; it is a better world because of his passing; the light of a generous and large soul has been shed on our controversies, the touch of a pitying hand has been laid on our sorrows. The future must show whether we have appreciated our blessing. If we greet the days only to repine at our loss, then our loss is sad indeed; but if we try to live by the light he showed us and to follow it to the source whence he brought it, then we shall have found the prize of life. For, friends, let me bear this testimony. Though his life was strenuous, he found joy in his labours; though his generosity was without measure, he was enriched in all his giving; though he was quick to all the vigils of love and service his own life was serene and glad and beautiful. He was happy in the multitude of his friends, and in the number he counted and kept men of all shades of opinion; he was happier, who won this wealth of affection by his own sincerity, simplicity, and contentedness of heart. Gentle hands tended his last hours, reverent feet followed him to his last rest, innumerable benedictions crown his memory. He was strong, brave, and pure. He loved, and he was loved again. He did the work of a true man. He was a faithful pastor, a generous friend, a devoted citizen. He has left the world better than he found it. He has made the battle easier for weaker men. He kept the Faith; he has won the crown.

"'He hath fared forth, beyond these suns and showers,
For us the autumn glow, the autumn
flame,
And soon the winter silence shall be ours:
Him the eternal spring of fadeless fame
Crowns with no mortal flowers.'"

There were many more pulpit references, and generous appreciations have appeared in all the Irish papers. We hope to give some extracts next week.

IN MEMORIAM R. L.

GONE in thy noon:
O Friend! Came it not too soon,
The summons to end thy strife,
With the zest of life
Unspent?
Soon, ah too soon!
In our discontent,
Say we:
But for thee,
Eternity,
The shoreless, tideless, central sea:
The bosom of Deity.

THE mark this quarter on the now familiar cover—"Vol. IV.; No. 1. October, 1905"—reminds us that in three years the Hibbert Journal has achieved a brilliant success, which is of greater significance for the progress of religious thought, and not of thought only, but of vital, working force. One may find within these covers some disturbing things, representing many aspects in the conflict of present-day thought; but even radical opponents rouse to action, if it be only to prove the validity of more wholesome views; and when one comes upon such an article as that by Professor Henry Jones on "The Working Faith of the Social Reformer" one feels a nobler breath of life stirring on the field of duty, and must rejoice to think how many will be kindled by such keenness of thought and moral ardour to devote themselves to the same high service.

We noted last week that the editor had received from Viscount Hayashi, the Japanese Minister in London, a message of cordial appreciation of the first two articles in this number. To the second of these articles, by Mr. Jacks himself, in which he asked: "Is the Moral Supremacy of Christendom in Danger?" we devoted our leading article last week, and we shall here simply add the concluding sentences of the article. The claim of Christianity to be supreme, Mr. Jacks says, must assuredly fail, unless it finds its exponent in renovated national life.

"It is good for us thus to realise that our ideal and our practice are at variance, even though it be the finger of a non-Christian race that is pointing to the breach. All our Christian pride will not prevent us from taking heed. It is, indeed, the conviction of the writer that the present hour is the fullest of hope for humanity which the world has seen for long ages. Not the least element of that hope is the prospect of a union between the forces of Christianity and Buddhism for the uplifting of mankind. For these two religions, in their highest expressions, are not estranged. They are approaching each other, and their approach is the dawn of a better age."

The first article is by Professor Anesaki, of Tokyo, on "How Christianity appeals to a Japanese Buddhist." With gentle irony he declines to discuss the position of those who explain the similarities between other world-religions and Christianity as due to imitation prompted by the Evil One, to lure men to destruction, and then shows how near the highest Buddhist faith is to the Christian. "Where there is faith in Buddha," Professor Anesaki says, "there may grow the faith in Christ. The two religions may preserve their respective traits, but they must share in the deep root of religious faith. Japan may remain Buddhistic, or be converted to Christianity, but she will in either way keep her own tone of national spirit and civilisation, and in this way play a part in the grand concert of humanity."

One of the most interesting passages in this article is that in which a similarity is traced between the Italian religious art of the fourteenth century and the old Buddhistic painting. "My impressions," says the writer, "when I first saw Angelico's Madonna in the National Gallery of London, and then in Florence, were simply the feelings I had when I looked at the old paintings of the Tak'ma school. Not only in intention and depth, but in treatment and colouring they show a striking similarity. . . . . Their paintings were not for the sake of amusement or of dilettantism, but for worship. For them art was not a merry thing, but serious as life."

The concluding passage of this article was written in response to a special request from the editor that the writer would state what appear to him the defects of Christian morality.

"What I wish to point out is certainly not the defects of Christianity itself; but there is one thing which strikes our minds as regards the actual tendency of Christians in Europe. It is the exclusiveness of their attitude toward non-Christian peoples. Apart from the theological or ecclesiastical exclusiveness, there is manifest a moral one, especially in recent years. Not only ignorant monks or farmers, but the educated classes and influential rulers, see in the rise of a Buddhist nation the incarnation of Antichrist or a diabolic power. Everything, however good and beautiful it may be, should be extinguished if it is not Christian. These words were addressed by an Emperor to his soldiers going to the East, and they were stimulated to commit murder for revenge, so that the peoples of the East might remember for a thousand years the terrible vengeance of the Christians. These and similar phenomena are by no means products of true Christianity, but only remains of Jewish bigotry. The harmony and concert of the world's religions and nations are made impossible by this un-Christian Christianity. If we should be threatened by a bigotry like this we are ready to stand against it in the name not only of Buddha, but of Christ Himself."

These are words which we should like to see blazoned abroad throughout the world. May they be taken to heart in the Courts and Camps of Europe!

Professor Henry Jones's article, above referred to, is the first of a series in which he will reproduce in a revised form a course of lectures he gave under the Dunkin Trust at Manchester College, Oxford. The aim is "to speak to those who are feeling their way into social usefulness, and whose main hope of comprehending their social work lies in looking at it in the large context of religiously inspired thought." Professor Jones feels that a better time is dawning now that religion is being moralised, and morality is being socialised. The problems of society, he says, are in the last resort problems of character, and can be solved only by a spiritual agency, "by the associated will of good men, which is what the Church ought to mean." And he dwells upon the importance of thoroughly understanding the social environments in its vital bearings upon character. We would call special attention to the paragraph on p. 56 on what schools of learning may do for social reformers. As to the spirit in which social work is to be approached, we cannot refrain from quoting this other passage:—

"Aristotle demanded good character of the student of ethics; and, following him, we may say that if a man's equipment of sympathy is scanty his study should not be men in their mutual relations, not that system of services we call society, but something else. We can understand the needs and wrongs of men only if we feel them, and we can remedy them only by atoning for them in our own lives. The reformer who has not this working faith in his fellow-men, who only blames them and attacks their institutions, has not learnt the alphabet of his science. Hard judgments of human character and human institutions are generally false and always shallow. The helper of mankind recognises the good in that which he would change, and finds room for it in the greater good he would bring into the world."

The only other article we can mention this week is that on "Authority and Theology," by the Principal of Hackney College.

Dr. Forsyth has made a triple onslaught on the faithless of this generation, during the last few weeks, in this article, in another in the October Contemporary, and in his address as Chairman of the Congregational Union at the autumnal meeting at Leeds, on "The Grace of the Gospel and the Moral Authority in the Church," to which we referred in a brief note a fortnight ago. Dr. Forsyth is strong in logic and in asserting the dogmatic position which he deduces from his premises; but, as we read him, and take a broad view of the religious progress of the world, we are constantly brought back to the question concerning his premises. But is that true? Is that really true of human nature? Is that the only way by which God delivers from sin and gives the strong and calm assurance of faith? "The Redeemer from moral death is the seat of final authority for a moral humanity. . . . . Our final moral standard is the Gospel of the Cross with its ethical restitution of things." "There are ultimately no ethics, therefore, but theological. The natural conscience, were it accessible, would certainly be an object of scientific interest. But, strictly speaking (as has already been hinted), in civilised communities to-day it does not exist. It is a mere abstraction of thought. What does exist is a historic product, deeply and permanently moulded by the Christian ethic of sin and redemption which for two thousand years has been shaping European morals." So Dr. Forsyth. But as we read these lines the impression was still fresh upon us of the first two powerful articles in this number of the Hibbert, and the question was irresistible, "What, then, of Japan?" The Cross is a great power in the world, but hardly what Dr. Forsyth would make of it.

These are but the first four articles in this number, and there is a great deal more that is of the highest value and interest.

CENTENARY HYMN.*

GATHERED here before Thee, Father,
Heirs of old-time prayer and toil,
Praise we render for the founding
Of our School, on hallowed soil.
While the hundred years were fleeting,
Still the hosts of scholars came:
Here they met, with joyous greeting:
Here they learned to love Thy name.

Glory now be Thine, Almighty,
For the workers passed away:
Earnest preachers of Thy gospel,—
Heralds of this happier day;
Faithful men and women, living
Lives that shone with radiance bright,
From their inward treasure giving
Truth and wisdom, love and light.

In the spirit of the Master,
Of each faithful Christian soul,—
Calling children's hearts to listen,
While the years yet onward roll,—
Helping every youth and maiden
Pure and strong in Christ to be,— Lifting burdens from the laden,—
Gladly we will work for Thee.

Grant, O Father, blessed! holy!
That while on us shines the sun,
Never from our hearts may perish
Thoughts that here have made us one.
Then, when life's long day is ending,
And the quiet shadows fall,
Still Thy love, above us bending,
Shall enfold us, each and all.

MINISTERS' PENSIONS AND INSURANCE FUND.

AT the recent half-yearly meeting of Managers it was reported that eighty-one ministers were already insured in the Fund, and four more applications were granted. Mr. Bryan E. Johnson was elected a manager in place of Mr. J. Cogan Conway, deceased; and Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery was elected as an auditor in Mr. Johnson's stead. The lamented death of the Rev. Richard Lyttle would necessitate the first insurance claim since the formation of the fund. A donation of £2,000 was received from Mr. Philip H. Holt, of Liverpool, to be applied at the discretion of the managers, as an addition to capital, or in aid of ministers on active service, or both. A cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Holt for his generous gift, and for the considerate way in which it had been made was passed. It was resolved that this donation should be treated, not as capital, but as accumulated income, and arrangements were made for suitably investing it. The way has now been made easier for helping, as the managers desire to do (and as they have done in one case, and promised in another) those older ministers for whom the insurance premiums are prohibitive. They only regret that under their constitution they are unable to assist ministers not provided for by any other Fund, who have been obliged to retire from active service through the weight of years or infirmity. That could only be done by means of a supplementary fund specially raised for the purpose.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GIANTS.

WHAT is a giant? We have all read something about giants; we all know something about them. Let us see what it is that goes to make a giant, and why we always want to take the side of the giant-killers, such as Jack, who killed Blunderbore and Cormoran.

To begin with, a giant is a man bigger than other people, and stronger than other people, but that is not all. Strength itself is good. We may admire a strong man for his strength, and we certainly do not admire the giants in the stories. We rather fear them, and rejoice when they are slain. For they are not only big and strong, but cruel, too, and their great size and great strength makes them able to do more harm than other cruel men.

Giants take what they want by force—food, money, or anything else. They are lazy and do not work, do not do or give anything in return for what they get, but just take it from another, and perhaps take it in a cruel way, too.

So we may say that a giant is a big, strong man who uses his strength cruelly, and takes what he wants by force.

If a big, strong man uses his strength to work, we do not think of him as a giant like those in the old stories. A porter who carries luggage, a blacksmith, the muscles of whose "brawny arms are strong as iron bands," the policeman who keeps order, may be gigantic—like the giant—in size, but, since he uses his strength not cruelly, but in useful work, he is not a genuine giant of the old sort. For the old giants all hurt or destroyed other people.

Did you ever feel that a great engine, moving nearer and nearer along a railway line, was like a giant, devouring coal and breathing out a red glow, and strong enough to destroy whatever comes in its way? But we know all the time that the engine-driver is there, guiding the great machine, keeping its great strength in check so that it may do no harm, and even able to make it come forward so slowly and gently that the birds may hop about near its wheels without getting hurt.

In one of his poems Longfellow makes a windmill talk as if it were a giant, dwelling in a tower, and devouring all that comes within reach of his jaws of stone, and always greedy for more:

"Behold! a giant am I!
Aloft here in my tower,
With my granite jaws I devour
The maize and the wheat and the rye,
And grind them into flour."

Flour! It is this last word that shows the difference between a windmill and a real giant. The corn is ground into flour for the use of others. The strong arms and the granite jaws of the windmill work for the good of all—for the farmers who sell the corn and for the people who buy the flour. This poem, like "The Village Blacksmith," shows the beauty of strength spent in useful toil, and describes also the Sunday rest and peace that comes to those who spend the week in useful labour.

"On Sundays I take my rest;
Church-going bells begin
Their low, melodious din;
I cross my arms on my breast,
And all is peace within."

You see, it is not only having great strength that makes the giant, but using it cruelly—misusing it. If we misuse our strength in any way we are taking the side of the giants rather than of the giant-killers. By using our strength to hurt others, even to tease others, we are behaving like giants.

Is it only in story-books that there are cruel giants, or are there any real ones still in the world? Perhaps they are not so big as they used to be, and we give them different names now. We call them tyrants or bullies, and sometimes we find tyrants, bullies—little giants, if we may call them so—even amongst our little people.

Children like to feel that they are growing bigger and stronger. "I'm bigger than you" is a frequent boast. It is pleasant to feel big and strong, and it is pleasant to use strength or skill. Children very soon show pleasure in their strength, and they have to learn not to hurt. They have to learn not to catch flies, not to tease a kitten or a dog, or a child smaller and less strong than themselves. They have to learn not to use their strength or skill like a bully, like a tyrant, like a giant.

As Shakespeare says:

"It is excellent
To have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous
To use it like a giant."

Many old tales tell how brave young men like Jack the Giant-Killer fought against those stronger than themselves who used their strength cruelly.

Sometimes cruel force is overcome by strength, sometimes by gentleness.

In his play of "As You Like It" Shakespeare tells one of these old tales. The first giant is overcome in a wrestling match and can no longer use his giant's strength tyrannously like a giant. Orlando, as the giant-killer is called in this story, can use his strength gently, too, and at last overcomes the cruel hate of his elder brother by gentleness in the Forest of Arden. You can read the story for yourselves in Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare," and can find out for yourselves who is the third giant in the story, and in how many ways Shakespeare shows the power of gentleness.

The greatest giant of modern times was Napoleon—not in body, for he was a small man, but in strength of mind and will. He used his strength, his power, cruelly, hurting and destroying other people in order to get more power still for himself. He hurt the French people themselves, as well as other nations,—took their liberties or their lives. So the French can now feel that he was their enemy, too, and they have joined with the English in honouring Nelson, in celebrating the victory of liberty at Trafalgar. The French and the English together have reason to honour Nelson because he checked the advance of Napoleon, the giant of whom all Europe was afraid.

The friendly feeling between the French and the English has been the best part of the Nelson centenary. Nelson used force in such a way as to make for gentleness in later times and for peace between the nations.

DR. DRUMMOND'S RESIGNATION.

THE announcement, which we make this week, that Dr. DRUMMOND has resigned his professorship and his office as Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, and that the resignation is to take effect next June, will touch the deepest sympathies not only in his old students of the past thirty-six years, but in all friends of the College, who have felt the power and the beautiful grace of his personality, and have recognised the worth of those rare gifts of scholarship and spiritual insight, which he has devoted for so many years to the service of the College.

The severance of ties long established must always be painful, and such a reminder that our time is hastening on cannot be without some thought of sadness. Yet, in this case, it is a far deeper satisfaction and thankfulness, which must prevail. We look back over the years rich in faithful service, remembering what they have produced of very precious and abiding worth; and we are not losing Dr. DRUMMOND from our midst. If he naturally feels at three score years and ten that he may claim some release from habitual toil, we rejoice to know that it will be for the harbouring of his strength, to concentrate it on his finest work; and that we may hope for years of a beautiful and quiet evening, in which a benignant presence will gather ever more closely about it the reverence and love of understanding hearts, and our Teacher in the things of the Spirit will have further gifts to garner for us out of the rich experience of his inward life.

Dr. DRUMMOND'S work has been done in quietness, with a rare self-effacement, in the spirit of the truest humility, but none the less, his influence has been deep, and in the truest sense inspiring on those who have been touched, in one generation of students after another, by the hidden fires of a moral ardour bent on the loftiest ends, and a spiritual faith, abiding in communion with the Highest, which were always there, and are still unabated, at the heart of his unobtrusive life.

Dr. DRUMMOND was himself a student of the College, and no one has had a more perfect apprehension of its great ideal as a Free School of Theology and a training-place for ministers of religion. He succeeded in 1869 to the chair of JOHN JAMES TAYLER, and twenty years ago, on the retirement of Dr. MARTINEAU, become Principal Through the momentous time of the removal from London and the establishment of the College at Oxford, he has been its representative before the public, and on each occasion —at the opening of the first Oxford session in 1889, at the opening of the College buildings in 1893, whenever there has been need for a strong declaration of principle and the setting forth of a noble and beautiful ideal, the friends and supporters of the College have been happy to feel that its cause was in worthy hands. And we, perhaps, have not adequately realised how much the College has owed, during these first years at Oxford, in the cordial welcome it has received and the respect it has won in the University, to the distinguished scholarship and the personality of its Principal.

Dr. DRUMMOND is the author of standard works on the Jewish Messiah and PHILO of Alexandria, of a Commentary on the Pauline Epistles, the second volume in PUTNAM'S International Handbooks of the New Testament, and most recently of a masterly book on the "Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel." In his Hibbert Lectures, "Via, Veritas, Vita," on "Christianity in its most simple and intelligible form," he appealed to a wider circle and gives one of the most luminous and beautiful interpretations of the life and teaching of CHRIST to be found in modern literature. Among other publications we may mention his little book on "The Pauline Benediction," three sermons preached in Manchester College Chapel, in which the very heart of his teaching will be found. These are among the achievements of many years, and we are happy to believe that while these remain with us, a possession of great worth, and while Dr. DRUMMOND'S work as a teacher, with its high ideal of scholarship its pure loyalty to truth, and its deep insight into the spirit of the Christian life, lives on in many men whom he has helped to form and send out into the world, he has himself still much to give us; and for this we must earnestly hope that strength and undisturbed opportunity may be abundantly granted him.

When last May Dr. DRUMMOND celebrated his seventieth birthday, his old students united to send him a letter of congratulation and affectionate acknowledgment of all they owe to him. To our great regret we were not permitted to publish this letter and Dr. DRUMMOND'S response, but we must be allowed to mention the fact now, and to say that since then the old students, and a large number of other friends, have made a subscription (now completed) to present a portrait of Dr. DRUMMOND to the College, and that Sir GEORGE REID, R.S.A., has undertaken the commission. It is hoped that the portrait may be presented at the close of the present session, which will also be the natural occasion for a full acknowledgment, so far as that is possible, on the part of the Trustees and other friends, of what the College has owed to Dr. DRUMMOND, and of the warm regard and affection in which he is held by our whole community.

FROM DR. DRUMMOND'S SERMONS ON "THE PAULINE BENEDICTION."

THE deepest truths do not come by way of the understanding, and no dogma can make them known. The grace of Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Spirit, are not doctrines, which can be taught to those who have no spiritual eye to discern them, but realities which must be seen and felt before they can be understood. And this is the peculiarity of the Christian revelation, that it comes to us as the word made flesh. It is the disclosure of a pure and consecrated soul, bringing the love of God into the midst of the world's sin and woe, and subduing men by the power of its grace.

When the same Spirit of Divine love reigns in all hearts there is true fellowship, and the superficial movements of intellect and will can no more break its harmony than the rustling leaves of a forest can disturb its solemn beauty. The intellect, with its imperfect and limited powers, shapes for itself such divine images as it can; but though the same eternal reason may shine in every soul, we cannot all see it alike, and we interpret it according to the measure of our gift. Our activities are of many sorts, suited to the complex wants of society, and directed by the variety of our natural endowments. But through all there may be the same heavenly Spirit, the same sweet graciousness of temper towards our fellowmen, the same loving devoutness and submission towards God. Here alone can we find the true ground of ecclesiastical unity. We seek it in vain by the pathway of the intellect; for it is the business of the intellect to question, to discuss, to explore, and knowledge is continually passing away while nature delivers up her secrets and we climb to new levels of thought. But the deep life of our common humanity, cleansed and renewed by the Spirit of God, would bind us together into a holy brotherhood, had we not built again the artificial separations which Christ destroyed; for those who adore and love the same Father in Heaven must reverence and love one another.

THE VISION OF LIFE.*

BY THE REV. W. J. JUPP.

"AND he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it and on either side of the river was the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." (Rev. xxii, 1, 2.)

Thus, after the weird and appalling scenes of judgment, there came, to this lonely seer, a calm, bright vision—the vision of a redeemed city, the New Jerusalem, with its clear stream, and fruit-bearing trees. From the high seats of power mingled with gentleness—for so I understand the words: "proceeding from the throne of God and of the Lamb"—from the heart of creative might, which is also self-sacrificing Love, flowed the river of the water of life. And it would seem, therefore, that the seer's glance into those secret realms, where dwell the "hidings of power," was, in its final meaning, just a vision of life—that the real, the ultimate significance of the "Revelation" is that.

And if we go back to the Gospel records concerning one, to whom this seer often refers, whose servant the revealing Angel is, we find him saying: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." And one of his followers, writing of him, said: "He hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." And this, in truth, is always the great and final concernment. To have life, and to have it more abundantly—to drink deep of the river of life, to pluck from the tree of life its many kinds of fruit, to have rich and varied experience of the reality of things, to be in vital contact with the facts of this amazing world, to be open on all sides to the inexhaustible energies of Nature, and the regenerative powers of Spirit, and to feel within oneself the living and creative forces of love and thought and will—this is the great matter, this is the true significance of the world for us all. For this the sun rises every morning, and children are born upon the earth, and corn ripens in autumn days, and the toil of the ages goes on.

And it is for this that the Prophet, the Reformer, the Redeemer of men always "comes." The great Saviours of the world always save by enriching life for us, by demanding of us that we live more intensely, more passionately, with more "vital feelings of delight." He may indeed—this Saviour or Prophet may assail us with appalling words of condemnation or rebuke; he may, like the apocalyptic seer, mete out his judgment with fiery indignation; and his withering scorn of our false aims and silly ambitions may be like the breath of an east wind or the lash of hail in a traveller's face. He may take down our idols with ruthless or with gentle hand; he may rouse us from dreams of vain pleasure with a startling cry of woe. But he will always mean life—deeper, richer, keener, lovelier life.

Yes, and the prophetic soul within us means that, too. The reforming spirit of our own hearts, the unrest of reason and conscience, the visions of ideal justice and love—to which none of us are quite strange—these also mean "more life and fuller." It may not always, and at first, be what we call better and happier life. Sometimes the fresh impulse comes with tumult and strange fears. The prophet within us may bring "not peace, but a sword"; the awakening of a nation may mean revolution. The arousal of a soul conscious of ideas and passions surging within, but understanding them not, may lead to grave disaster at first. Nevertheless, to be fully alive, to enter upon the heritage of life, strong and rich and varied—that is the great matter.

Religion, in fact—that amazing, indestructible element in man's nature—is just life, in all its strength and passion, flushed with the ideal, tempered by grave insight, and charged with unfathomable hopes—or fears. Religion comes, or, rather, is always here with us, not to rob us of things, not to deny and restrict, not to narrow or to crystallise our thoughts, not to curtail our interests and hamper our aims and desires; it comes to enlarge the world for us, within and without, to make every object more vivid to sight and touch, every idea more intense and vital, every action more significant, and the whole human self responsive to God and the universe.

And hence the purpose of Religious Fellowship is to foster and deepen life in the souls and bodies of men. The work and worship of the Church—which is the home and sanctuary of religion—is to make us greatly alive, to feed the springs of thought and passion, to give fulness and depth to human joy and human sorrow and human purpose. We meet in Religious Communion to escape from the deadening influence of things, from the dulness and density of mind which will sometimes creep over us, in the hurry of affairs, or the dreariness of much that happens, or seems to happen, in the actual world.

"He showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, and on either side of the river was there the tree of life." We are all being shown this now, and it is changing our conception of the world. Time itself is now no more the stream of oblivion, down which all things are being swept into nothingness and death. And that old figure of Time with his scythe, going forth to mow the nations down like grass, fits our thought no longer. Time is the onward movement of the Spirit of life—the flowing, life-giving stream. We believe no more in a dead universe, with a few ephemeral living things appearing here and there, to pass away and perish. The great world lives and breathes and feels; it throbs and pulsates with life. It not only brings forth living creatures; it is itself a Life. The unity of the whole is a vital energy of Spirit; God is immanent and creative in all. And the world is this, today, not only for the seer, the mystic, the artist, but for all. The science-men, the advanced among them, are telling us how alive the world is; and they speak of it sometimes as men breathless with wonder, expectant of strong and surprising revelations in this so vivid and vital universe. The seer, the true mystic, has always discovered, by his intense gaze, a living universe; but now everyone may discern this. Science and philosophy unite to assure us of that marvellous something, named "Law," as breaking into life on every hand, and therefore itself charged with living energy, present and prevailing throughout all space and time.

It remains for Religion to accept and appropriate this great revelation, and to show its divine significance for men. And if the Church, the Spiritual Society of the world, is to fulfil her mission in these great days of knowledge, she must receive and express this life in its highest meaning, its deepest passion, its noblest peace. She will, of course, concern herself, sometimes, with dogmas and creeds; she will not be indifferent to forms of worship and the ritual of devotion; and she will uplift her standards of ethical truth. But her high office is to make life abound in the hearts of men, to bring life and immortality into clear, strong light by the gospel. The sectarian, combative theological temper can never, perhaps, wholly die out of the Church; but it must cease to rule there. We must no more waste much time in defining or dogmatising or disputing about words and rites and rubrics. A small committee, here and there, of leisurely, elderly men and women might be deputed to discuss these matters. "Definition is limitation"; but life is infinite, flowing, and free; and it is life that men want. I have read somewhere of a good minister of the Baptist persuasion who, keeping holiday among the Swiss mountains for the first time, climbed to a lofty alpine summit; and beholding there a scene of great magnificence—vast fields of snow, glaciers, and lonely mountain peaks, he exclaimed, "Good heavens! what can the Almighty care about baptism by immersion?" Well, it is probable that the Almighty cares about everything that has interested or perplexed the mind of man. But this good preacher was among the awful splendours of the world; the sublimity of Nature, charged with unknown mysteries of being, faced him there; and, in presence of this amazing reality of God, the form of an ancient rite, by which his religious sect was distinguished from other sects, seemed a very little thing; the majesty of the living universe meant so much more. He may not have left his own denomination, but I think he joined the Church of Universal Religion that day.

"My country," said Dante, "is the whole world," and our religion must have to do with the large, full life of man, in this living universe; our church must break to them, and with them, the bread of life. Let no man say that theories and dogmas and critical investigations—things that pertain to what we call rational belief—are of no significance; to a very large number they are of very great significance. But they are not the people's bread of life. That which redeems men, that which overcomes the world, that which suffices and saves, is not theory, however rational; is not doctrine, however sound—or unsound; it is spirit; it is vital feeling; it is a strong pulse; it is ardour of soul; it is largeness and keenness and intensity of nature—it is life.

How can the Church nourish and sustain this, duly? How may the opportunities of religious fellowship wisely serve to enrich the quality, to deepen the flow, to quicken the pulse, to guide the passions of life?

We know, of course, that, in one sense, life is its own master and goes its own way. It is the energy of the universe, infinite and eternal, and we are the creatures of its power; we seem often to be but as the bubbles on its stream, the foam of its breaking wave. The soul of the world creates and lives in its own forms, both small and great. "The Spirit bloweth where it listeth." The mighty laws prevail. God himself is life, and He liveth and moveth in the freedom of His own necessity. We are only His children, and must abide in the good pleasure of the whole. Yet life, as it comes to us self-conscious creatures, has one great charm, one most beautiful and enchanting significance. There is granted to us that wondrous faculty of attention or choice. We can reflect on things, and so can emphasise and concentrate, here and there, on this or that. We can use what we call the Will, or power of selecting. It is an amazing gift, this faculty of attention, however limited by the great laws. For it brings us into the region of opportunity; it affords the chance, so to speak, of taking from the manifold play of incident and circumstance that which may enrich or impoverish, that which may refine or vulgarise life. While the other creatures choose by natural selection or "instinct," we choose by spiritual selection, or the reflecting will—and the tragedy of our life comes in here (in part, also, doubtless, the comedy, too). For the choice has fallen so largely in recent years on things that impoverish life. We have given attention to the wrong things, and sin has entered thus—the destructive demon of life. The trouble has come, mainly, through laying undue emphasis on possessions and appearances, on the desire to own things, on the luxury of display, and the lust of power. We have concentrated so much on outward and material "goods," on getting the control of huge accumulations of "property," as it is called, that to be "well to do," to own much, has become an ambition, a craving, a master purpose and prerogative of living, to many. Ridiculous as it may seem, and hard to believe in sane moments, people have actually been envied, admired, fawned upon, cringed to, almost worshipped, because they had acquired much in the realm of outward appearances and possessions. They have believed that a man's life does consist in the abundance of the things that he possesseth. This, of course, has impoverished life to an extraordinary degree. Those who have succeeded in getting the control of vast possessions, and those who have wished to, and failed, have suffered loss in the matter of real life and its joy, beyond anything words can express. So, also, have those who have given superfluous attention to the mere pleasures of sense—the glutton, the drunkard, the sensualist robs his life of its finer significance. He becomes poor by emphasising the least receptive, the most easily exhausted side of his nature.

The Church then, the spiritual society of men, is here to redeem from this; and we who belong to any fellowship of the Church have to find for ourselves, and to help others find, the secret of being rich in true life, strong and wise in the selection of that which nourishes the whole man, which makes for the eternal joy of living. How shall we do this? Since men can hinder life or squander it; since they can narrow and stunt it till they become starved with asceticism, or waste it and become wanton in self-indulgence, we have to learn and to impart the secret of sustaining life abundantly, and yet with temperance, of saving men in all the fulness of God—so that they be neither starved in a world of plenty, nor sated or submerged by the fatal "too much."

We remember how the Greeks, to whom life was so rich and abounding, yet laid such stress on self-mastery and self-control. And this meant to them, not so much an asceticism or self-denial, as a wise selection, a commanding or withholding power of receptiveness and appropriation, as well as of expression. The famous "choice of Hercules," the great decision of Socrates, of which Xenophon tells, and the relative worth of the three kinds of goods whereof Plato, in the "Republic," speaks, are illustrations of this. They wished to select from the affluence of life's gifts that which secured the fullest possession of its strength and joy. Temperance meant that, rather than sacrifice, asceticism, renunciation, regarded as a virtue in itself.

Jesus demanded of men that they should, if need be, cut off a right hand, pluck out a right eye, but only that they might "enter into life." And if such mutilation or restriction of powers were necessary, it would surely be a sad and regretful necessity—something better, only, than having to be consumed in the cleansing fires of love. The monastic cult of self-denial, or bodily asceticism, was, after all, a false ideal, a belated and unnatural "means of grace." Jesus required of some that they should "sell all that they had and give to the poor," in order to be of his fellowship. And Saint Francis found it well to be rid of all his possessions because they came between him and life and the fulness of its joy and service; and many are finding now in "simplicity of living" the secret of deeper and more abounding life. We must each find our own way to the true source of delight and devotion, of duty and health. But we can aid each other in this; we can profit by joining the "Communion of the Saints"; the Church can fill for us the cup of salvation and make us drink and be abundantly satisfied.

So I come to think of every fellowship of the Church as a centre or university of life. It is the focussing of a particular kind of power—the power which selects and emphasises the nobler qualities, the finer energies of life. It would impart or foster the temperance of enrichment—the self-denial which is really a selecting of the more (the part that is more than the whole)—a culture of the great sufficing goods, the treasures and pleasures which are of heaven, enduring, exhaustless, eternal—things which are ends in themselves for a free personality.

Of course, the great redeeming power of the Church is its Love. The spiritual society charged with Christ's Spirit means a love that cares for its members or for mankind with a passion of sympathy which cannot be suppressed or, in the end, resisted.

Every Christian fellowship exists to foster a spirit which loves men as men, apart from their merits, and in spite of their worst iniquities. But then, it is to be a rational love and by no means an indulgent one. It will insist on things that make for real life, in its human and ideal significance. It will demand of men; it will relentlessly demand of them, that they give attention to and select the true riches. It will not fear or hesitate if need be (like the peace-loving ruler of whom Isaiah told) to "smite the earth with the rod of its mouth and with the breath of its lips to slay the wicked." Its word of God will be as "a sharp two-edged sword," piercing to the heart of wrong. This awful power of reflection and choice in men—the Church, through its fellowship, must guide and control that. "That your love may abound more and more," said the Apostle, "in all knowledge and discernment . . . . that ye may approve the things that are excellent." Let us think for a moment of some of those excellencies of life on which the Church must now, more and more, resolve to concentrate her thought and passion.

Knowledge, of which, at one stage of development (or was it of re-action?), many of her leaders were afraid, is now felt to be a part of the very bread of life. The facts, as we call them, and the laws of nature, which the facts unfold, are of immense significance in order to fulness of healthful living. For these facts are not dead things. There is no such thing as a dead fact in this living universe; all is vital and of some concernment for the mind. The fellowship of the Church, then, will be friendly to the revelations of science. It will welcome its discoveries as disclosures of the mind of God. It will try to shape its creeds and order its worship in harmony with them. The Church has often resisted and opposed the advancement of knowledge; it has persecuted some of its pioneers and saints—but always to its own great loss. It must do this no more. And it is good to be living in times when there are religious communions in which knowledge is welcomed with joy, and science is honoured as a messenger of heaven. To belong to such communions should be a theme of praise to us every day. For love—the love of knowledge in man—is part of the love of God, and is given that we may have life and have it more abundantly.

And then there is that wonderful fascination or enchantment of this living universe which we call Beauty; the Church will give attention to that if it would aid men to live wisely and passionately. "And God said, The heavens and the earth, and all that is between them, think ye that we created them in jest?" This amazing world of objects so fair to look upon—lilies of the field and birds of the air, sunset and dewy morning, blue cloud-frescoed sky, woodlands so green in spring, many-coloured in autumn days, "waters on a starry night," mountains and valleys and waves of the sea, the human form, the face of a little child, the smile playing on the features of old age, the love-glance in the eyes of a friend—think you these are accidents of creation, the mere by-play of mighty forces that work by chance and care not? The exceeding wonder of it all! What is it? We wist not what it is. "It is manna"; it is that daily bread in the wilderness for which we do not labour, the free grace of heaven, the bounty of providence, the overflowing of love which delights in beauty and gives us power to rejoice in the living forms of the Spirit whose breath of life inspires them all.

The Church was once afraid of this, too, and sought to call men's interest away from the charm of lovely things. Her children thought Beauty a device of Satan; they hid themselves from it in cell and cloister. Yet even in monastic times Nature was often too strong for them; and you know how in those strange, great days of the middle ages, saints and doctors of the Church would break forth into praise of the beauty of the world. Such masters as Francis and Bernard and Bonaventura were among the heretics in this regard, and, like most heretics, they were in the right. The Church must be the lover and friend of beauty. Its fellowship should be in all lovely things; its buildings should be fair to see—I would that their walls could be frescoed with delightful forms and scenes—and its worship should be full of grace, the grace of simple, reverent, joyous song and music and speech and silent musings. For we live, in part, by admiration; and in loving and enjoying together the beauty of nature and of art, we "behold the beauty of the Lord and inquire in his temple."

But not in receptiveness only will the Church enrich and refine life for men. In expression, in creative activity it will minister to men. For work may be so inspired, so flushed with ideal meanings, as to be an end in itself, and so a replenishing of life to him who does it. "The happiness of man in what he gets is limited, but the happiness of man in what he does is unlimited. The receiving capacity of the nervous system is soon exhausted, but the discharging capacity has no limit but that of natural periods of rest. The pleasure in expression increases with use, the pleasure in impression decreases with use." The truth is overstated there, perhaps; but when the significance of will and of personality is realised at all, we see how much of truth that distinction holds. For man is called to co-operate with God. Creativeness is essential to his life. Sources of original energy are within him, and his nature is stunted till they are unsealed. Man is Artist, Maker, Poet, Producer. We are here with power to serve in the freedom of love's activity. And the Church will kindle and direct this power. Her fellowships may or may not have their own social activities, their organised bands of workers. But they will kindle in men the passion of service; they will be centres of impulse to creative life. The simplest forms of the Church's worship will be a call to action; its devotion, its musing on divine things, its love of the eternal, its faith in God should fire men with creative ardour. "My father worketh hitherto and I work." "I must work the work of him that sent me while it is day." "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." That is the true spirit of religion; that is a part of the message of the Church to the world, for the enrichment of its life.

And yet we shall remember that life is more than this—that not in knowledge, nor in admiration, nor in work is it fully and finally blessed. "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day," said this ancient seer. Vision, Contemplation, Insight, Reverie—without this no man fully and abundantly lives. "The pure in heart shall see God." Life, in all its depth and fulness, is a vision. Paradise is divine perception. The Church must open the eyes of men; it must lead them within the veil. It should make us all mystics in the great moments of communion. It should teach us to dream dreams and see visions, to cease sometimes from labour, from thought, from research, from the duty of improving ourselves and the universe, that we may simply listen and behold inwardly, that we may wonder and muse, and breathe the air of realms not seen. Herein is life—the divine reality of life, the fulness of immortality, the peace and the blessedness of the Soul's real existence in God.

But I must not speak of this now. Permit me, in conclusion, a word of homely, practical suggestion. What is wrong with the human world is paucity of life; what makes men immoral and unhappy is the shallowness and sluggishness of their lives. It is from lack of true and deep and passionate life that we fall into sin and misery. Sickness and disease and vice all come of inadequate or intemperate life-force. Life in its depth and fulness means holiness and health. Men turn to drink, to gluttony, to gambling, to sensual pleasures, to the piling up of riches, because they are only half alive. They are overworked and underfed, or they are nursed in ease and luxury and overfed; they are unemployed, or cruelly, excessively employed; they are without knowledge or without beauty, or without any vision of the divine reality of things. Life is suppressed, curtailed, enslaved, or artificially pampered. Nature, the strong, deep, passionate nature of man, is denied its true activity and expression, and it breaks out in gross and evil excitement; it goes mad with reckless and vain desire. And it is not by denial and repression, not by punishment and penance and fear that these things can be changed; it is by giving to all men access to the true bread and water of life; it is by giving them freedom and scope to live to the utmost the real life of Nature controlled by Spirit. And therefore the thing to strive for is social opportunity—freedom of access to all the treasures of knowledge and beauty and service and insight in this world of abounding possibilities. What we see now is the denial of this. We see a few men luxuriously privileged, sated to excess; we see vast numbers of men lacking nearly every necessity of real life, struggling for bare existence. There is no real brotherhood of opportunity, no fair equality of access to the things which nourish the true, deep life of the human creature. The Church, the Religious Fellowship, must stand for this brotherhood, or it must fall into ruin and and decay. It must demand life, the bread of life for all men. What is needed now is not a reformed State-Church, but an inspired Church-state, a social order in which the spiritual fellowship of the mankind shall be the vital and informing power. Let us work for this. Let us proclaim this gospel of life, of fraternity in opportunity. Let the Spirit of the Lord be upon us, annointing us to preach good tidings to the meek, sending us to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captive, the opening of the prison to them that are bound, the liberation and distribution of the energies of life.

In attempting to fulfil this ministry of grace we may be called opprobious names—dreamers, demagogues, idealists, secularists, socialists. But names don't matter. Life does. The people perish for lack of life. They want knowledge, and beauty and peace; they want work which is fruitful service to the community; and they want leisure to muse on the mystery and glory of the world. And Religion—the spirit of Christ—the fire of love, the passion of brotherhood, would grant them this in abundance.

Has not the Church power to make the world achieve these things? Are not the resources of the Kingdom of God with her? Can she not serve men still? Are the leaves of this tree of life no longer for the healing of the nations? Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Can we not present the higher things of love and duty and service, so as to win men over to them, and make them choose and live?

Yes, to win them by the charm, the entrancing beauty of the good and wise—that, in the last resort is the true ministry. The fascination of life, on its heavenly side, the alluring grace of brotherhood and social virtue—our religious fellowship must reveal that. You remember how the Greeks fabled of the two so different ways of resisting the Syrens' power. Ulysses, nearing the fatal rocks where the beautiful demons sang men to their doom, filled the ears of his men with wax, that they might not hear, and had himself bound to the mast that he might hear, yet be unable to steer the ship to her destruction. But Orpheus, when the "Argo" sailed that way, stopped no ears, and stood himself unbound. He took his lyre and played and sang in strains more sweet because more divine than theirs; then no one wished to steer where false delights allured to death.

"The music of the Syrens found
Ulysses weak, though cords were strong;
The happier Orpheus stood unbound
And charmed they by a nobler song."

And so may the Church by its love of knowledge and beauty; by its passion for service; and its mystic visionary insight, win men from evil; win them to enthusiasm for the finer things of life, and create a spirit of brotherhood for which the selfish, soul-destroying vices shall have no charm. The Free Catholic Church, of which our little free Christian societies are the beginnings, or the prophecy, shall yet bring the glories of heaven to the hearts and homes of man, and lead them unto living fountains of water.

And thus shall it be possible to say, no more in mockery or derision, but in the joyous confidence of love, "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at Essex Hall, London, on Thursday, October 26, at which twenty-four members were present. Apologies for absence had been received from seven others, including the President (Mr. W. B. Bowring), who was unavoidably detained by public engagements in Liverpool. His predecessor (Rev. J. E. Carpenter) took the chair. The following, among the items of business, will be of interest to our readers.

The programme for the Triennial Meetings at Oxford next Easter was settled, and various arrangements were approved.

A Report was presented of a Conference which had been held of the representatives of various Trusts which assist churches, ministers, and students for the ministry. Resolutions, suggested by the Conference Committee, in favour of the formation of a "Consultative Board" had been sent to the various Trusts with a request that the representatives might be authorised to vote upon them. The invitation to send delegates had been accepted by eighteen Trusts, including the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, the Sustentation Fund, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Fourteen of these were represented at the Conference, and the several suggested resolutions, with some minor alterations, were adopted almost unanimously. A small committee was appointed to prepare a preliminary scheme, which will be submitted to the various Trusts, in preparation for an adjourned meeting of the representatives.

Applications from the congregations at Aberystwyth and Child's Hill (London) to be placed on the Roll of the Conference were granted.

It was agreed that the next meeting of of the Committee should be held at Manchester in January, on the same day (not yet fixed) as the annual meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, Oxford.

OLD age is a beautiful crown, to be attained only by the way of temperance, integrity and wisdom.—Herder.

THIS presumption in favour of all beauty and sanctity in human life, and in the universe, is faith. It has a moral character, because it implies a personal knowledge of the higher principles and affections of our nature as able to rule the lower; they have been listened to as oracles; they have indicated themselves as realities; they have submitted to no fatal insult, but have kept upon their lawful throne. No man can believe in a rule over creation which is powerless over himself, or see in other souls a goodness traceless in his own.—James Martineau.

GOD, who is the Author of our nature, whether it knows Him or not, has made all the lower parts in harmony with all the higher, each in its turn to serve as feeder and inlet to that which is above—sensation to feed memory, memory to feed intellect, intellect to feed imagination, and all together to feed the soul. . . . The nobler they are and the higher they soar, all the stronger are the signs of an unfulfilled intention until they know their God, for their limit is but our visible humanity, and our visible mortality, so long as they touch no exhaustless Source of their own life.—John Hamilton Thom.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

SIR,—I was unfortunately prevented by professional engagements from attending and speaking at the meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on October 25. Perhaps you will therefore permit me to mention a matter of interest to the denomination which I meant to have spoken upon. It appears to me to be of the very greatest importance that as many as possible from our body should attend the meetings of the International Council to be held in Boston in 1907. Those of us who are still fresh from the Geneva Congress know what a source of inspiration and enthusiasm it was. Yet the Boston meetings must of necessity be still more so. They will be amongst English-speaking folk to begin with, and the linguistic difficulties will be fewer. The churches there are more powerful and alive than anywhere else, and the welcome accorded to us will arise from a kinship in blood as well as in faith. We younger laymen are constantly bemoaning the lack of life in our body. What better means are there of kindling that life afresh than by visiting our friends across the Atlantic and helping others to do the same? Now, I think it is quite clear that the men who will most wish to go, and who would certainly benefit the most by going, are the very ones who will find the necessary expense the greatest difficulty,—I mean the ministers of our various churches. If they are benefitted, their congregations must benefit, too. Knowing the splendid heroism of so many of our ministers, and some of the difficulties under which they work, I feel that this is one which we laymen can remove. I propose to start a Fund, to be called "The Boston Conference Fund," for the purpose of raising money to assist ministers who wish to attend the Conference by defraying their expenses, at least in part. I may say the working of the scheme will be entirely confidential, and no disclosure will be made either as to the persons who have been helped or to what extent. I hope, at the annual meeting of the London and District Unitarian Society, to be held at Essex Hall on November 8 at 8 p.m., to go more into detail than I can now. In the meantime, I shall be glad to receive the names of laymen willing to help forward the scheme. I have already encouraging proof that the lay members of our London churches will generously respond to such an appeal. I feel sure Unitarian laymen in the provinces will not be behind London.—Yours faithfully,

C. HERBERT SMITH.

A UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

SIR,—The following circular is being issued by the Committee of the Missionary Conference, who will esteem the favour of the wider publicity of your columns. The subscriptions and donations will be duly advertised. Thanking you in anticipation I am, yours truly,

THOS. B. SPEDDING.

Rochdale, October 31.

[COPY.]

DEAR SIR, OR MADAM,—At the Annual Meeting of the Conference, in July last, it was decided to undertake a Van Mission in 1906.

The object of the Mission will be to spread a knowledge of Unitarian principles, in villages and districts where no churches of our faith exist, and to co-operate with existing churches, Missionary Associations, and Postal Missions wherever possible. What has been attempted for cultured audiences in the addresses of Professor Carpenter, the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and others, and for great town audiences in theatre services conducted by Rev. J. Page Hopps, Rev. J. C. Street, and others, it is proposed to extend to a different class of hearers by means of the Van Mission. Theological controversy will be avoided, and the Mission will seek to take its place side by side with, and not in opposition to, existing agencies. It is felt that on the living questions of the hour Unitarians have a message of courage and cheer which should be spoken, while the negations may safely be left to those who have a liking for them.

The Mission does not start with the ostensible idea of founding Churches. Small circles of inquirers might be formed in some places and be brought into association with the Postal Missions. But while there are whole tracts of country destitute, and likely to remain destitute, of churches, it is open to reach them by other means. A church building is not essential to the message.

The Mission has been warmly supported by THE INQUIRER and Christian Life, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has promised assistance in the provision of literature. Already several ministers have offered voluntary services. It is estimated that from £10 to £12 per month would cover the cost of maintenance, removal, travelling, advertising, posting, &c., and it is hoped that at least 100 meetings may be held in the five months from May to September inclusive.

Including the purchase and equipment of the Van, and the Mission expenses just enumerated, a sum of £250 would probably suffice for the first season's work. An anonymous donor has promised £100 towards the purchase of the Van, and a few smaller donations have been received.

An appeal is now made for £150 and for annual subscriptions, in the belief that there are many friends in the churches who will gladly assist in this effort to carry our message into districts where our principles are practically unknown.

Cheques and P.O.'s may be forwarded to the Treasurer, Rev. T. P. Spedding, 91, Tweedale-street, Rochdale.

Signed,
A. GORDON, President.
T. P. SPEDDING, Treasurer.
W. R. SHANKS, Secretary.

THE HIGH PAVEMENT SUNDAY SCHOOL CENTENARY.

SIR,—In your interesting notice of the Centenary of the High Pavement Sunday School is an omission, doubtless through want of space, which I should like, with your permission, to remedy. You make no mention of some of the veteran scholars and teachers in our school who are still with us. Mr. Street, whom we were delighted to welcome, is, notwithstanding his record of 61 years, scarcely out of the youngest class! We had the pleasure of having among us, at one or other of our meetings, several friends whose advent in the school was long anterior. There were with us Mr. John Hewitt (of Nottingham,) who entered the school in 1830; Mr. Richard Keating (now of London), who became associated with it in 1834; and to whom the writer is much indebted for many interesting reminiscences; Mr. George Cox, and Mr. William Selby, (both of Nottingham), who were scholars as long ago as 1840, while the latter has an unbroken association with the school of upwards of sixty-two years, during the last fifty of which he was a regular teacher. We owe so much to these old friends of ours for their warm interest in the school, and their youthful enthusiasm for all that concerns it, that we should be sorry were their long connection with us not placed on record in your pages.

Nor do these exhaust our list. I merely mention those who were present with us; there are still, we rejoice to know, many old and attached scholars living in Nottingham of equally long standing in the school, who for various causes were unable to attend the meetings, but whose sympathy with the school is as deep and sincere as that of the friends I have named. JOHN C. WARREN.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Blackburn.—At a meeting held on Monday last, a committee was chosen to institute Unitarian services here. On Thursday, the committee met and appointed Mr. W. H. Rigby, secretary, and Mr. J. J. Widdup, treasurer. Sunday evening services will be arranged at first, to be conducted by Unitarian ministers.

East London Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The following officers have been elected for the ensuing session:—President, Rev. W. H. Rose; Vice-president, Mr. Alfred Thompson; Treasurer, Mrs. Wood, 49, Darnley-road, Hackney; Hon. Secretary, Mr. A. H. Verstage, Park Villa, Godalming. The opening meeting was held at Stratford on Saturday, October 21, and took the form of a social gathering. A good number of teachers and friends from the various schools were welcomed by the Stratford teachers, and a very enjoyable evening was spent together. Other meetings are to be held monthly during the winter.

Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society.—The autumnal meeting of this society was held on Friday, Oct. 27, in Ullet-road Church Hall, Sefton Park, when Mr. and Mrs. Richard Durning Holt gave a reception to the members and friends "to meet the Lord Mayor of Liverpool, the Right Hon. John Lea, J.P.," who had kindly consented to preside on the occasion. At the outset the President of the society (Rev. T. Lloyd Jones) read several letters of regret for absence from Sir John and Lady Brunner, Sir Edward and Lady Russel, Rev. Dr. Watson (Ian Maclaren), Mr. and Mrs. Robert D. Holt, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Holt, Misses Melly, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Booth, jun., &c. There was a large and influential attendance. The beautiful hall was crowded, many being unable to obtain sitting room. The Lord Mayor said, as one with a pronounced temperance feeling, he was very pleased to be present. While allowing adults such liberty as they might claim, there could be no doubt that children were much better without intoxicants. Having testified to the admirable reform work of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, founder of this society, he pleaded for temperance work for the sake of the city, the State, and the Empire. Alderman W. B. Bowring moved a resolution approving the aims and efforts of the Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society, and commending it to generous support. He gave a most encouraging report of the progress of the Liverpool Temperance Public-House Company, stating that the first café in Mill-street had proved so successful that a second had been opened in Lodge-lane. The Rev. C. Hargrove seconded the motion in a speech which riveted the attention of the audience for the greater part of an hour. The story of his conversion to total abstinence struck his hearers as remarkable and unique. On the outbreak of the last South African War, he was led, out of sympathy with the suffering, to deny himself the small glass of whisky which he took to induce sleep, and the glass of wine or beer taken at meals to assist digestion, he having been accustomed to take wine or beer with meals from boyhood. Of course, he did not expect the war to last many months—(laughter)—but the longer the hostilities were continued the better he found that he slept without the whisky and the better he digested his food without the wine or the beer. (Renewed laughter, and applause.) When the war was over he did not feel the slightest desire to return to the liquor to which he had been accustomed for nearly half a century, and he reviewed the whole question of the drink. The only reason he could find for taking wines was Matthew Arnold's reason that, in strict moderation, they added to the agreeableness of life, being pleasant to the palate and thought conducive to geniality. Against this slight and by no means always sound argument in favour of wines, he placed the following reasons to the contrary—(1) wines, spirits, and beers were poisons; (2) even a moderate use was dangerous in several ways; (3) an evil example was set to the young and others for whose welfare responsibility could not be shirked; (4) there was waste of means. There was less excuse, he maintained, for the rich who consumed intoxicants than for the poor. On God's earth he knew no such a curse as that of alcohol, and if he believed in the Devil he should say that the Devil invented this curse to humanity. In a most impressive speech Mr. Philip H. Holt proposed a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor for his presence, which was seconded by Rev. T. Lloyd Jones. The Lord Mayor, who is a staunch total abstainer, in responding, remarked that, after hearing the powerful exposition of temperance principles by Mr. Hargrove, he could not recall having listened to any speech equalling this as an argument in favour of total abstinence.

London: Essex Church.—To-morrow evening, and until further notice, the time of the evening service will be changed from seven o'clock to half-past six.

London Guilds Union.—The autumn meeting of the London Guilds Union was held at Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, on Wednesday, October 25. The proceedings opened with refreshments and social intercourse in the schoolroom, followed by a devotional service in the church, conducted by the Rev. G. Cooper. Miss Edith Gittins, of Leicester, opened the conference with an address from Browning's words:—"Lending our minds out." Miss Punnett, Mrs. Bruce, and Mr. Noel took part in the conference immediately following the address. The President of the Union, Mr. A. Thompson, presided, supported by the Revs. F. K. Freeston, G. Cooper, and W. H. Rose. About 70 representatives were present from Essex Church, Highgate, Mansford-street, Stratford, and Walthamstow Guilds.

London: Kilburn.—During November Mr. Bimal C. Ghosh, of the Brahmo Samaj, will conduct the services, and deliver a special series of addresses on "Indian Religious Thought."

London: Mansford-street.—The thirty-eighth annual meeting of past and present scholars, teachers, and workers of Spicer-street and Mansford-street was held Nov. 1. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, B.A. welcomed the visitors in the name of the present teachers and scholars. A good programme of music was given. There was a large attendance.

Mansfield.—A most successful three days' bazaar was held last week. Everyone connected with the church worked with a will, and the support accorded to them by their fellow-townsmen of all denominations was very gratifying, and contributed largely to the success of the undertaking. The members were fortunate in securing the presence of A. B. Markham, Esq., M.P., who opened the sale on the first day, and of the Mayor of Mansfield, G. H. Hibbert, Esq., as chairman. On the second and third days the opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. George Holt, of Liverpool, and by Franklin Winser, Esq., J.P., of Nottingham. The total amount obtained was about £500, and the members of the Old Meeting House are to be congratulated on such a satisfactory result. Not only the funds but the life of the church has greatly benefited by this effort. The money obtained is to be devoted to extensions in the Sunday-schools and some alterations in the approaches to the chapel.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.—A special meeting was held after the Council of the B. & F.U.A. last week, at which stirring addresses were made by Revs. W. G. Tarrant and C. Hargrove; Mr. Chancellor read a paper on "The Temperance Movement and the Pulpit," and a discussion followed, in which the Revs. W. C. Bowie, E. Turland, C. J. Street, Mr. F. A. Edwards, and Mr. Seely took part. The Rev. F. Allen presided. The feeling was expressed on all sides that our churches need to be roused to more effective action in connection with the drink question.

Oldbury.—A tea-meeting and sale of work in connection with the Oldbury Unitarian Meeting House took place on Monday week (October 23), at the Free Schools, the proceeds being devoted to the McKean Memorial Fund.

Pontypridd.—A successful concert, in aid of the Church funds, was held at the Town Hall on Thursday, the 26th ult. The committee feel deeply grateful to Mrs. Whitaker, of Cardiff, for taking the place of an artiste who was unable to fulfil her engagement.

Portsmouth.—At the invitation of the Management Committee of the Ancient Order of Foresters the members of local Friendly Societies attended a special service at the General Baptist Church, St. Thomas's-street, Portsmouth, on Sunday evening. Brother T. Bond, the District Treasurer, who is the pastor of the church, conducted the service, and welcomed the attendants to that venerable place of worship, the oldest in the borough.

Pudsey.—Mr. F. Duxbury conducted services last Sunday, in the course of them giving several recitations. There were large congregations.

Scottish Unitarian Association.—The annual meeting was held at Glasgow last Saturday. We are obliged by press of matter to defer report till next week.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—The land upon which the new school chapel is to be erected is now in possession, and building operations have actually begun. The memorial stone will be laid on Thursday, Nov. 23, by Mrs. R. T. Eadon, a former resident in Attercliffe, and one of the oldest living members of the Upper Chapel congregation. Full particulars will be announced in due course. Towards the cost of the land and building, the latest estimate for which is £1,650, over £1,000 has been raised locally; the Yorkshire Unitarian Union have given £250, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association £50. Arrangements are being made for a bazaar to be held in the early spring. Sewing meetings are held weekly both at Channing Hall and at the Attercliffe Vestry Hall, and the ladies of the three congregations in Sheffield are busily employed.

DID any man at his death ever regret his conflicts with himself, his victories over appetite, his scorn of impure pleasures, or his sufferings for righteousness' sake? Did man ever mourn that he had impoverished himself by integrity, or worn out his frame in the service of mankind? Are these the recollections which harrow the soul and darken and appal the last hour? To whom is the last hour most serene and full of hope? Is it not to him who amidst perils and allurements has denied himself, and taken up the cross with the holy resolution of Jesus Christ?—Channing.

RIGHTEOUSNESS must be brought down from dreamland to the heart of the crowded city; and purity, instead of being the vision of a sighing fancy, must be resolved into the demand of a present Lord. There is no such thing as a necessary evil. —N. W. Crosskey.

IT is not true that self-love is our only principle, or that it constitutes ourselves any more than other principles, and the wrong done to our nature by such modes of speech needs to be resisted. Our nature has other elements or constituents, and vastly higher ones, to which self-love was meant to minister, and which are at war with its excesses. For example, we have reason, or intellectual energy, given us for the pursuit and acquisition of truth; and this is essentially a disinterested principle; for truth which is its object is of a universal, impartial nature.—Channing.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

Chairman.—Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

Vice-Chairman.—Mr. G. H. LEIGH.

THE Mission Committee appeal to the generosity of friends of religious work among the poor.

They have been obliged to decide upon the extension of their premises at Willert-street and Renshaw-street on account of the constantly increasing work at the two Missions. They propose to enlarge the buildings at Willert-street at a cost of about £1,200 (the necessary land has been bought), and those at Renshaw-street at a cost of about £1,500 (part of this scheme has already been completed).

Owing to the increasing demands upon the funds of the society, and the loss of old and generous friends and subscribers, there is an annual deficit of more than £150. The Committee wish to pay off the existing debt, and to provide a sum for future needs. For these objects they require at least £3,500.

They acknowledge with gratitude the following donations :—

GOOD FOOD is the SEED of GOOD STRENGTH.

CADBURY'S COCOA is a pure, natural, strength-giving food that feeds and supports the system thoroughly.

The Lancet says: "The statement that CADBURY'S COCOA is an absolutely pure article cannot be controverted in view of the results of analysis which in our hands this excellent article of food has yielded."

The Civil Service Gazette says: "The finest example of Cocoa manufacture is undoubtedly CADBURY'S, for it is not only a delicious and winsome beverage, but a nutrient for the invalid and athlete alike."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE suggestion of a "Boston Conference Fund," which Dr. Herbert Smith made in last week's INQUIRER, he further elaborated in a speech at the autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, reported in our present issue. Dr. Smith was the first President of the London Laymen's Club, and many of our readers may know him as Treasurer of the Stopford Brooke Lectureship Fund at University College, a work in which he has been associated with Dr. Blake Odgers. Those who know him well, understand that beneath the lightness of his touch and the pleasant humour of his speech there is the strength of a very earnest purpose, and the generous heart of a true man. We wish Dr. Smith every success in realising his happy thought (he said it was his wife's first of all) and carrying out a scheme which holds, we believe, the promise of very real benefit, not only to the body of our ministers, but, as Dr. Smith urges, to our whole community.

SUPPOSING two hundred of our ministers were actually enabled to go to Boston in September, 1907, what a relief it would be (this was one of the touches in Dr. Smith's speech which we were not able to embody in the report)—what a relief it would be, during the month or six weeks of their absence, to the laity in this country! And what an opportunity, we will add, for the elect laymen in those two hundred churches to take upon themselves the conduct of the services. And how glad they would be to have their ministers back again!

THE following resolutions were passed at the recent meeting of the National Conference of our American brethren at Atlantic City, N.J. :—

Whereas the American delegates to Geneva have given to the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers a cordial invitation to come to America in September, 1907, we express ourselves as heartily approving that invitation; and, while we naturally leave the initiative and administration of this undertaking to our executive arm, the American Unitarian Association, we hereby declare ourselves ready to co-operate in every way with it.

Resolved, That in the interest of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers to be held in September, 1907, it is desirable that the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches should hold only so much of a session in that year as would be necessary to comply with the requirements of its constitution, to the end that its sympathy and its efforts should be given to the success of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

Resolved, That the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches invites the co-operation of the Universalist General Convention and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in America for the Meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in September, 1907.

THE Committee of the Sunday School Association announce with regret the resignation of their treasurer, Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., owing to his acceptance of other duties which he has lately undertaken. The resolution accepting the resignation, while expressing the sincere regret of the Committee, desired more especially to place on record their gratitude for the assistance rendered to the Association for so long a time—a period of twenty-five years. The Committee and all friends of the Association will feel the loss, but they are quite assured that it will continue to possess Dr. Odgers's personal influence and help, although not in an official capacity. The Committee desire to inform members and subscribers—and they do so with great pleasure—that Dr. C. Herbert Smith has kindly consented to accept the treasurer's office, and that in future cheques should be made payable to him, crossed London and South-Western Bank, and forwarded to Essex Hall.

MR. THORNEYCROFT'S fine statue of Gladstone, erected in a splendid situation by the Church of St. Clement Danes, in the Strand, and within a stone's throw of Essex Hall, was unveiled by Mr. John Morley on Saturday last. Viscount Peel presided, and the Duke of Devonshire also spoke, thanking Mr. Morley on behalf of the subscribers for the eloquent address he delivered. "It was good," said Mr. Morley, "that the statue should be placed there, above the thronging tide of men, that they might know by his achievements, and by his character, which was greater even than his achievements, how great a thing the life of a man may be made." It had been lately said that Gladstone's great qualities were faith, courage, and labour, and of these he thought the greatest was his dauntless courage. In him they saw an extraordinary combination of the magic and glory of the orator with the passion and power of the man of action," and Mr. Morley quoted Lord Salisbury's description of Gladstone as "a great Christian man." The statue is of bronze, and at the four corners of the pedestal are symbolic groups of "Brotherhood," "Education," "Aspiration" and "Courage." Except for the upraised sword of Courage, which somewhat breaks the harmony, the general effect is very fine.

WHETHER Count Witte can run the Russian Empire single-handed seems becoming a practical question. Obviously, the Tsar's manifesto, to which we referred last week, was the work of the Count, and the Count certainly seems determined to carry out some real measure of reform. Some, for Count Witte's mind is not easily deciphered. But it were no ignoble ambition, if, having gained a diplomatic triumph in America, he aims to link with it a political victory at home. And for the moment victory seems in his grasp. His foes are yielding. The fanatic but honest chief of the Holy Synod, M. Pobiedonostsev, has resigned; M. Bulyghin, Minister of the Interior, has resigned; and if M. Trepoff remains, he hardly remains to help Count Witte. Where then is he to find assistants? For the members of even the most moderate of the reform parties will not serve with him, they do not trust him. Indeed, this ready yielding of the reactionaries seems rather like a bit of Jiu-jitsu, and we fear that the apparently defeated party may again, and before long, gain control of the Imperial mind.

MEANTIME there does seem to be a prospect of good for distressed Finland, something in the nature of a restoration of constitutional rights. And if the outlook for Russia as a whole is still one of terrific gloom, we may rejoice in the hope of better things for one of its constituent nations. And, even as to Russia, we see one element of hope which is sometimes overlooked in this country. We hear of widespread anarchy and outrage, and people are dreading what may happen if the strong arm of the Government is enfeebled. Well, for one thing, this anarchy is largely the creation of the Government, and, for another, if the central bureaucracy were overthrown it would make very little difference, except for the better. The Mir would remain. The Mir is the real unit of local self-government which dispenses justice among the peasants and which in so many ways furthers the communial life. We have in this country nothing quite like the Mir, an institution for mutual aid and mutual control of the people by the people. In this lies the hope of Russia.

THE REV. CHARLES W. WENDTÉ, Secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, who has been for the past four years Minister of the Parker Memorial Church in Boston, preached on October 8 his farewell sermon, and retires from the superintendence of that Mission. We understand that after a good rest Mr. Wendté will return to the active work of the ministry. His address now is 352, Tappan-street, Brooklyn, Mass.

PROFESSOR F. G. PEABODY, who is at present lecturing in Berlin, has resigned his charge of the College pulpit of Harvard University, which he has held for twenty-five years. He retains his Professorship in the Divinity School.

MR. F. HORTON, who is a member of the Cambridge congregation, which meets for Sunday morning services at 10, Emmanuel-street, and a son of the senior warden of the Church of the Messiah in Birmingham, has been elected a fellow of St. John's College.

ON Wednesday evening next, the London Unitarian Choral Society is to give a concert at Essex Hall. The programme includes choruses from Handel, a Mendelssohn cantata, vocal, violin, and flute solos, and other items. Further particulars will be found advertised in another column. The Choral Society will, we trust, receive the encouragement of a large audience on this occasion. Its aim, to improve the music of our churches, is most admirable.

IF any man will be Christ's disciple, sincerely good, and worthy to be named among the friends of virtue, if he will have inward peace and the consciousness of progress towards Heaven, he must deny himself, he must take up his cross, and follow Christ in the renunciation of every gain and pleasure inconsistent with the will of God.—Channing.

PRESIDENT ELIOT'S ADVICE.

To the Freshmen entering Harvard at the commencement of the present session, President Eliot gave the following address:—

"It is fifty-six years since I came here, a new student as many of you are. I have had a chance to see the steady stream of men who have come and gone during that time. I have had a chance to see what the durable satisfactions of life turn out to be. I have seen the sons and grandsons of men that I knew coming in here to be Harvard men, as their fathers were, I hope that you, as they, are after the durable satisfactions of life. They are the satisfactions that are going to last and grow.

"There is one indispensable foundation a young man ought to have; he ought to be a clean, wholesome, vigorous young animal. That is the foundation for everything else in this life. We have to build everything else of a useful career on bodily wholesomeness and vitality. This involves not condescending to the ordinary vices of life. You must avoid drunkenness and licentiousness in order to be a clean, wholesome, vigorous young animal.

"But this alone will not satisfy you. Sports are legitimate satisfactions; but if they are made the main end they cease to be durable satisfactions. They must be incidental, not the main end. To attain all these things we must have intellectual power and ambition. This mental enjoyment should come best to the educated man. The educated class live by the exercise of the intellectual powers, and they enjoy life of this sort better than those classes which work with their hands for their livelihood.

"A young man ought to get here in college a capacity for rapid and keen intellectual labour. It is the main achievement of college life to win this mental force. There is, however, something beyond this power of mental labour. You must have a spotless reputation. It comes from living on honour. There are some things that the honourable man will not do and cannot do. He never degrades or debases a woman. He never oppresses persons weaker or poorer than himself. He is honest, sincere, candid, generous. It is not enough to be honest, however; the honourable man must be generous,—generous in his judgments of his friends, in his judgments of men and women and of history. Generosity is a beautiful attribute of a man of honour.

"What is the evidence of an honourable life? You look now for favourable judgment from your elders, from your teachers, parents, and counsellors, but that is not the ultimate tribunal. The ultimate tribunal is your contemporaries and the younger generation. The judgment of your contemporaries is made up early in your college course, and in a way that lasts for life. It is made by persons to whom you have never spoken, and who you think do not know you. Yet a general impression of you exists.

"Live now in the fear of that tribunal—not an abject fear, for independence is a quality in the honourable man. 'Cherish a decent respect for the opinions of mankind,' but never let that interfere with your personal declaration of independence. It is a very safe protective rule to live to-day as if you were going to marry a pure woman within a month. That rule is a very safe rule for life. It is well to learn to work intensely. It is well to do in one day what it takes three to do ordinarily. It is well not to take four years to do what can be done in three. Learn to get this power and to use it. Lastly, live to-day and every other day like a man of honour."

DR. FORSYTH, being chairman of the Congregational Union, there is consequent risk of his utterances being regarded as typical of Congregational thought. We therefore regard as especially timely an article in the Examiner which presents another aspect of the subject. The writer is indeed full of admiration for what he terms the incisiveness of the chairman, and considers to be an antidote against bald humanitarian mysticism with its facile descent into Unitarianism. But from Dr. Forsyth's positive positions he sharply dissents. "Dr. Forsyth, we are told, has built himself on German theologians, whose thought seems to me to move in a vicious circle . . . they wanted to set out with a system of definite dogma, in which the reason could rest. The system was to rest on the Bible as its basis, but before it was complete the higher critics had cut the ground from under their feet. They renewed the attempt, making the 'historic Jesus' this time the foundation on which the system was to rest. But again historical and textual criticism seemed to combine to defeat their object." The writer believes there is a nobler thought of Congregationalism "which has not been worked out by German theologians, and which Dr. Forsyth consequently ignores" (a shrewd thrust this). And this nobler thought, the truth which "torpedoed the Calvinistic doctrine," what is it? What but the good Unitarian thought that "God made man in his image" and that though Jesus Christ is Light of the world there is also "a light that lighteth every man."

"TEMPERANCE SUNDAY" is to be observed on Sunday week, November 26. The Committee of the National Unitarian Temperance Association has issued a letter in which the following passage occurs:—"There are 327 Sunday-schools in the Unitarian denomination—291 have 36,034 scholars on their books; but we have only 99 Temperance Societies (81 Bands of Hope and 18 adult societies), with 6,074 members. We are sorry to find 20 of these societies are not affiliated with the Association. There are many schools without a Band of Hope, and thousands of scholars not yet enrolled as Band of Hope members. Is it not possible to have a Band of Hope in connection with every Sunday-school? May we ask you to make a special effort on Temperance Sunday to secure additional members for Bands of Hope in the Sunday-schools in which you are specially interested? Those scholars who are not able to attend the Band of Hope meetings might be induced by their teachers to enrol themselves in the Sunday-school Teacher's Pledge Book, or in a special column of the class register."

STUDIES IN STOICISM.

II.

STOIC THOUGHT OF BROTHERHOOD.

IN nothing did Stoicism pave the way for Christianity more than in the conception of brotherhood that it fostered in the Roman world. Brotherhood is one of the great words of Christianity. The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God had its necessary accompaniment in the doctrine of the brotherhood of man. The ideas and emotions clustering around that word have been among the most potent factors that in the course of the last nineteen centuries have broadened, deepened, and dignified human life.

Stoicism did more than till the soil in preparation for this seed. It was itself already busy sowing when Christianity appeared on the field to carry on the work with greater energy. Here, as in so many other connections, we find the underlying ideas in Stoicism very similar to those brought along by the great wave of religious enthusiasm from the East. Here, too, we find a difference very subtle but very real, and which belongs to the realm of emotion rather than to that of thought. Though this difference did exist, it has, as a rule, been greatly magnified by later exponents of Stoicism. The Stoics were not emotionless beings, though their philosophy was doubtless a check in many directions to the growth of sentiment. Thus Dr. Rendall, in his work on Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, seems to go too far in saying: "The forms in which sympathy for man is set forth are devoid of emotion." This will appear as we proceed.

The basal thought in Stoicism is that each individual man is an integral part of a great social whole, which is itself an integral part of a rational cosmos. Mankind is a unit, and the cause of the unity lies in Nature, Nature in its essence to be conceived of as divine. All individuals are bound together through the social trend inherent in their being. They are endowed with a spirit that reaches out from the mere good of self to the good of others, to the good of the race at large. This is a part of their divine inheritance. But in finding the good of others a man finds his own true welfare; for his own welfare is bound up with that of society at large, and selfishness and isolation always ultimately mean violence to himself.

Seneca likens human society to an arch of stone, all of which would fall to the ground if one piece did not support another. And in a way that reminds us at once of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, chap. xii. He declares: "We are only several members of one great body . . . . nay, we are all of a consanguinity." ("Happy Life," xvii.)

The keynote of Christianity and of Stoicism is here the same—self-realisation through the service of the social whole. The truth so forcibly enunciated by Jesus in the words: "Whosoever shall seek to gain his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it," was seen clearly and enforced in many ways by the Stoic. "He that has dedicated his mind to virtue, and to the good of human society whereof he is a member," says Seneca, "has consummated all that is either profitable or necessary for him to know or to do toward the establishment of his own peace." But it is in Marcus Aurelius that we find this truth insisted on most strongly and elaborated most completely. "Love mankind—follow God" is his summary of human duty, and the individual reaches his own self-realisation only by adopting that two-fold rule. Selfish isolation of interest means only violence to and degradation of oneself. "The soul does violence to itself when it turns away from any man, or even moves towards him with the intention of injuring." And so perfect does Marcus Aurelius conceive the identity of interest of the individual and of Society to be that he can write: "That which does no harm to the State does no harm to the citizen. In the case of every appearance of harm apply this rule—if the State is not harmed by this, neither am I." And again: "That which is not good for the swarm is not good for the bee."

There is this social tie, then, that acts as a natural bond of brotherhood between each individual and his fellow-men. To violate it means always to violate one's own being, and consequently one's own deepest and best interest.

The recognition of this is declared to be every man's duty. And the question arises as to how far personal affection is involved. There are, as I have said, many who believe that personal affection had little or no place in the Stoic conception of a man's relationship to his neighbour. That it had the place assigned to it in Christianity no one would maintain. And yet it seems wrong to leave the element of personal affection out of count in interpreting the Stoic position. True, the Stoic regarded the service of mankind as a duty (cf. Seneca, "Happy Life," vii.), and as a policy by which self-realisation is to be attained. But the Stoic set no light value on the prompting of affection in human relationships. Thus Seneca has a passage which reminds one of the very words of Jesus on perfect love: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend." It runs thus—he is speaking of friendship—"Where my affections are cemented by an equal and by a common love of goodness, neither hope nor fear nor any private interest can dissolve it; we carry it with us to our graves; and lay down our lives for it with satisfaction." This comes not through insight into a duty, but through strength and purity of affection. So assuredly Seneca was appealing to true sympathy when he wrote: "Relieve the distressed; put the wanderer into his way; and divide bread with the hungry." But the part that emotion plays in the right relation of man to man is best shown in the Stoic teaching concerning resentment and forgiveness, in which Christianity, impracticable in this respect though it has so often been declared, is again foreshadowed. Seneca wrote a whole treatise to show that anger in all its varied forms was unjustifiable and unprofitable. To seek revenge he declared to be inhuman, and the confession of an infirmity. "If a man thinks himself injured," he writes, "let him say, Either I have deserved this, or I have not. If I have, it is a judgment; if I have not, it is an injustice, and the doer of it has more reason to be ashamed than the sufferer." The pardoning of the offender is insisted on for the same reason that it was in the teaching of Jesus. In the Lord's prayer we find "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Jesus here and elsewhere links together our forgiveness of others and our own need of similar forgiveness.

So Seneca says: "Before we lay anything to heart let us ask ourselves if we have not done the same thing to others." We ought not to deny pardon to any man since we may stand in need of that pardon ourselves—"for we are all of us wicked, and that which we blame in others we find in ourselves." Marcus Aurelius writes similarly but in a sweeter and gentler strain.

Nothing could be more full of tenderness and compassion than that portion of the eleventh section of his "Meditations," in which he deals with the subject. If one is injured by another, he should admonish, but "not with any double meaning, nor in the way of reproach, but affectionately and without any rancour in thy soul. For what will the most violent man do to thee, if thou continuest to be of a kind disposition toward him, and if, as opportunity offers, thou gently admonishest him and calmly correctest his errors at the very time when he is trying to do thee harm, saying, 'Not so, my child. We are constituted by nature for something else; I shall certainly not be injured, but thou art injuring thyself, my child.'" Are we not wrong in thinking that behind all this there is only a cold reason and a straining after virtue operating? Is there not true benevolence and the sentiment of brotherhood at work? "Can all antiquity," asks Dean Farrar, "show anything tenderer than this, or anything more close to the spirit of Christian teaching than this 'Not so, my child; thou art injuring thyself, my child'?"

It is interesting to note that in one respect the teaching of Marcus Aurelius goes even beyond that of Jesus. Christ insists that there should be no anger and no revenge on account of personal injuries. But when the injury is done to others, to Society, there is, apparently, room for righteous indignation, and for the severest course of action. So we infer from the stinging rebukes of Jesus to the Scribes and Pharisees recorded in Matthew xxiii., and from the action of Jesus in driving out the money changers in the Temple. But Marcus Aurelius, at any rate, admits no anger or resentment even when the injury of others is concerned. "If the State is harmed, thou must not be angry with him who does harm to the State; show him where his error is." Such is the rule he lays down.

In the main the teaching of Stoicism respecting human brotherhood and its inviolability is thus in close accordance with the spirit of Jesus. Stoicism had not discovered the full power and significance of human love, but it had discovered much, and had discerned the underlying unity, the spiritual consanguinity of mankind. Thus it made straight the pathway for the Gospel of Christ, and prepared the souls of men for the coming greater spiritual movement.

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

LITERATURE.

ALEXANDER MACKENNAL.*

MR. MACFADYEN'S memoir of Dr. Mackennal is a very good piece of work. The life story is simply and judiciously told; the extracts from correspondence are well and tastefully chosen; and the balance between these two constituents of the book is discreetly adjusted. The task has been discharged with a kind of filial piety. Our author's father, Dr. Macfadyen, of Manchester, was a fellow student of Mackennal's at Glasgow in the early fifties, and his point of view is somewhat determined by an inheritance of life-long friendship. We do not mean that he is unable to get far enough away from the personality he is depicting, and therefore fails to see it in lights and shades and relations—a not infrequent defect in biographers. His ability to see the man as a whole is proved in the following words in which he speaks of Mackennal at the outset of his ministerial career.

"He was of the massive order of men, growing first on different sides of his character unequally, with powers not of the showy and captivating kind, which required time and freedom to develop. He was original but not brilliant; profound rather than captivating; and wanted from his human environment sympathy and patience rather than stimulus and constraint. The chief interest of his life lies in its continual inward development, and its constant unfolding of fresh and often unsuspected spiritual resources." This is true—even to the end, save that "out of strength came forth sweetness"—a certain winsomeness in ripe age that was certainly captivating. But the one thing we miss in the book is the picture of the man as he showed himself in free intercourse with contemporaries, equals and associates. We have him as the eminent man, divine, and teacher; leader and organiser, shepherd and counsellor of souls; and we have him in the admirable holiday letters, full of pure gaiety, and delight in nature. There seems to us to be a gap between these two aspects of the man which might be filled by some indication of what he said and wrote to intimate friends, especially on matters of religion; not in answer to any challenge of inquiry, or appeal for consolation; but as he would naturally speak of things which were uppermost in his mind, or nearest to his heart.

The last sentence of the passage quoted above is the real programme of the book; and the carefully traced story of development and unfolding cannot be concisely reproduced. Mackennal's external history is easily summarised. He was born at Truro in 1835. His father, Patrick Mackennal, was a Galloway Scot. The family removed to London when Alexander was thirteen, and he was sent to a school in the heart of the City, where Sir Henry Irving and Sir Edward Clarke were among his schoolfellows. A school at Hackney, three years at the University of Glasgow, and three at Hackney College, made up his academic preparation for the ministry. In 1858 he settled in his first pastorate at Burton-on-Trent; from 1862 to 1870 he was at Surbiton; and there he met the lady who became his wife. In 1870 he removed to the Gallows-tree Gate Chapel, Leicester; and thence, in 1876, to Bowdon, where he was minister of the Downs Chapel for the rest of his life.

Here is a life without sharp breaks and changes, save such as years and sorrows bring. His own reminiscences of early days show how continuous was its development—all things gathered into the treasure-house of observation and experience, and if any fall by the wayside, they can be recovered by the man who has never lost touch with the mind of the child. Here is a case in point:—

"Certain rooks have established a colony just outside my garden, and I am often awakened by their clamour. As I heard them a few mornings ago a vision flashed on my mind from the oblivion of sixty years—the vision of a very little boy in a very large bed, who used to lie and watch a rookery out of the upper panes of his window, and listen to the cawing. The rooks in the trees had not, however, the fascination for him which the rooks in the sky had. In the rookery the rook chatters and fidgets; the rook in flight strains and cries. He has thrown himself on the air which is a firmament to bear him up. Everything in him betokens a reaching forward; his projected head and level beak, his lengthened neck, the strong beat of his wings, are in unison with the yearning note of his voice. The child used to look up on a late afternoon when he heard the familiar sound, and the flying bird filled him with a strange non-content. He did not understand what he was feeling. Years after, when he read of 'The many-wintered crow that leads the clanging rookery home,'

he was glad that Tennyson had seen what he saw, and could interpret the sounds he used to listen for. It is not enough to say 'I was that little boy'; I am that little boy."

We have here a glimpse of the early stages of that conscious union with nature, and the intuition of the truth of the poetic word that records such experience in another, which was so characteristic of Mackennal, and which stamp his holiday correspondence with a peculiar charm. We do not wonder that the young preacher was credited with being able to repeat In Memoriam from beginning to end, and that the staid elders of the Church were somewhat astonished when Tennyson and Browning appeared copiously in sermons, side by side with Biblical authors. But "worse remains behind;" while in London he had been a hearer of T. T. Lynch, and when he went to Burton he was under the spell of F. D. Maurice. Though we do not hear much of this in the book, it is evident that this was a cause of trouble. Indeed, we are told that to be a disciple of Maurice was, in those days, a sufficient proof of heresy. We suppose the general judgment would be that Mackennal became more conservative, and more orthodox as years went on. Rather was it the case, we should say, that his liberalism and breadth moved from the region of opinion inward to that of principle, while certain questions of theology, and even certain elements of religion, which once appeared remote or non-essential drew nearer and demanded to be definitely taken or left. The moment he was aware of the reality of this faith, or this doubt, in another, it became a thing that he must deal with. It could not be ignored. He attributes a crisis of self-dedication in his own life to the discourse of humble Scottish Baptists in a Highland shieling; and a conception of the Church as a spiritual reality "which affected his whole ministry," to the sermon of a friar in Milan Cathedral; and this trait of Mackennal's character leads us directly to what the biographer justly calls a unique feature of the book:—the extracts from a series of letters, ranging over twenty-five years (1880 to 1904), and occupying five chapters, under the heading, "A Spiritual Directorate." A lady, who in youth had been connected with the Bowdon congregation, but had married and settled at a distance, came back and heard Mackennal preach, and met him on a social occasion. Mrs. A. (as she is here called) was a person of sensitive nature and acute mind, exercised in the reading of speculative and stimulating books at a time of life, when, as she owned, no sensible girl would know what metaphysics were. It was evidently no transient mood, but a rooted Welt-schmerz that made her regard Mackennal's cheerfulness as a flippant optimism.

"When the guests were gone, she challenged him with the question—'I know you think—how can you smile? Is it temperament, or have you any rational ground for looking so absolutely happy, when you know what is going on in the world?'

"He looked at her gravely, surprise turning into pity, and then said, 'No, it certainly is not temperament; will you write to me when you get home, and ask me that again?'"

Hence the correspondence, in which Mrs. A.'s share is represented only by brief indications of the circumstances—often acute suffering and distressing weakness, which shut her up with her own active mind, and its resolute questionings. The lengthy, and deeply interesting extracts from Mackennal's replies, not only supply a kind of Journal intime, but illustrate the characteristic of his mind to which we have just drawn attention—development in answer to challenge; a human sympathy acting like the thread in a chemical mixture, upon which the hitherto parted atoms of thought take shape and crystallise; sentiment often arriving at conviction, while the generalities of faith are sometimes sorely tried over particular applications. The general result of apologetics is well known. The counsel for the defence thinks better of his case as it proceeds, and proves a little more than he set out to do. And it appears to us that in the long course of this correspondence, Mackennal undertook to determine questions which, at the outset, he would have thought to be quite outside the lines of an anxious and sincere soul's quest for a trust in God. But who does not know how, to another mind, the perspective of spiritual things is different—the premisses from which you both desire to draw the one conclusion, are never the same as yours? And so Mackennal, who seems to us to speak with unerring instinct when he deals with the nature of doubt and faith, and the relation of religion to the trials and woes of life, might complain—but he never complains—when his correspondent, in her more vigorous moods, suddenly proposes such questions as "The Resurrection is not, is it, historically proven?" or "Where in the Gospel is there room for this transferred punishment? Who is to be propitiated?" And, perhaps, the answers to these questions are scarcely of the best.

If the Maurician stage of Mackennal's theology was characterised, as in so many cases, by a strong grasp of the human side of revealed religion, coupled with a rationalising interpretation of orthodox language, the letters in "A Ministerial Directorate," prove the entire dissipation of this latter element, and the early development of the former in the direction of that doctrine of the Christian consciousness, which has of recent years found much favour in evangelical circles; but we mean to allege in Mackennal's case only the most temperate and subjective form of this doctrine. He invokes science to testify that life is behind personality, and that personality springs out of life. "In the life of the divine," he says, "I seem dimly to see a unity underlying the threefold personality." He states, in a nutshell, the new plea for the doctrine of the Trinity, based on what is called the necessary conception of a social Deity—(it is, after all, only the Pagan appeal against the Christian's Deus unicus, solitarius, destitutus)—in the words:—

"If God is love, then again there is suggested to us a society in God, for love without some one to love is absurd; and how could society come up in history unless it first existed in God?" which question, repeated since by others in various forms, appears to us to be the very weakest thing that Mackennal ever wrote.

But we must close our very inadequate sketch of this interesting book. In shutting the book, however, our eyes fall on two things:—the first, a passage in which Mr. Macfayden notes Mackennal's critical attitude towards movements merely popular; his mistrust of Revivals, &c.; and a temper which might, at times, be called domineering. He continues:—"This note of a predominant personality would sometimes emerge unexpectedly at a church meeting, and give an impression that he ruled autocratically. Once it was: 'If anyone proposes to appeal to the Trust deed I place my resignation in your hands.'"

One is tempted to ask, do we see here only an ebullition of temper? or do we see the skeleton in the cupboard of the "Free Churches?"

And the second thing is the following sonnet:—

THE FORSAKEN CROSS.

"TEARS clear the sight" I said in pride of grief:
The wise have always learned in sorrow's school;
And in my scorn I deemed the man a fool
Who talks of happiness; "a respite brief
Is all the brave accept, no long relief."
I was the fool; I knew not that my eye
Was blinded with the tears I would not dry.
I sought the Cross to gaze upon the Chief
Of those who suffer; but the Cross was bare,
And to my wondering heart these words were borne:
"He is not here, but risen into His joy."
Dear Lord, forgive my pride, forgive my scorn;
The happy angels go on thine employ,
And Christ-like griefs for Christ-like joys prepare.

DR. SAVAGE'S POEMS.*

"AMERICA TO ENGLAND," the verses which give the title to this volume of Dr. Savage's poems, he read in public in New York on the eve of his departure for Europe this year.

The youngest of the nations,
Grown stalwart in the West,
Yearns back to where each morning
Glows o'er the ocean's crest,
And cries: O Mother Country,
Ours is your ancient pride,
And, whate'er may befall you,
Our place is at your side.

Ours are the old traditions
Of Saxon and of Kelt;
We visit rare Westminster
And kneel where you have knelt.
Your restful country places,
Hills, lakes, and London town—
Their memories we inherit
And share in their renown.

* * * * * *

You fought the fight for freedom
And taught mankind the creed;
Long ere our "Declaration"
There was a Runnymede.
We won at Appomattox,
But you had won before;
Our Bunker Hill and Yorktown
Look back to Marston Moor.

Our Washington and Lincoln
Were of your sturdy stock—
Cut out of Milton's quarry,
One piece with Cromwell's rock.
Our Pilgrims learned the lesson
That English means the free,
And through the wintry weather
They brought it over sea.

Here in the West grown mighty,
Though we alone might win,
We look back to the Home Land
And feel the thrill of kin;
Then let us stand together
Till over all the earth
Our manhood and our freedom
In every land have birth.

On that welcome note of brotherly union the verses continue to the close:

One race and one tradition,
English, American,
And one high inspiration—
The destiny of man!

Dr. Savage writes in the Preface with perfect frankness and modesty about his poems. "I have been writing rhymes," he says, "ever since I was seven years old." (He is now well over sixty.) "As poetry was my first, so it is my last love. Hood somewhere says that there are three grades of work in this kind: First, poetry; second, verse; third, worse. I have written floods of 'verse.' I fear I have written a large quantity of 'worse.' I venture to hope I have also written at least a little 'poetry.'" On this point he would be a bold man who should venture to determine at what point really good and pleasant verse passes into poetry, but for the critic's sake we will say that we hardly think any better poetry than the verses quoted above will be found in this volume. It is, nevertheless, full of interest, and many friends who honour Dr. Savage as a preacher of the liberal faith, many, in particular, who heard him preach from Calvin's pulpit at Geneva this summer, will be glad to see the book. It contains verses of many years. The lines on "The Pescadero Pebbles," and those beginning "God made our lives to be a song," appeared nearly thirty years ago in Dr. Savage's little book of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow, "Light on the Cloud," and the hymn, "O Star of Truth, down shining," is also widely known, while others are much more recent. From his little volume of poems published some years ago, and the "Hymns" which appeared in 1898, the author has selected what he judged to be the most fitting to survive.

The personal poems, chiefly in the form of sonnets, are among the most interesting in the book. Thus Whittier and Robert Collyer are both addressed on their eightieth birthday; another sonnet is on the death of Phillips Brooks, and there are others on Emerson, Darwin, Kepler, Lowell, &c. Two we will quote here, as fair samples, in conclusion of this notice.

MARTINEAU.

I have seen many old who yet were young;
As thy compatriot, Gladstone, past four score,
Who, lord of many fields, still thirsts for more,
And, just for play, will master some new tongue;
As Furness, whose fine brain is still fine strung
For all high thoughts to play on. But thy youth,
Thy still fresh eagerness for all fresh truth,
Marks thee most youthful, youthful souls among!

Most mariners at first scorn fear or ease,
At fifty take in sail and hug the land,
Then steer for some snug harbour in old age;
But thou, in quest of truth, dost sail all seas,
In quest of truth dost coast the farthest strand,
Eternal seeker still, though reverend sage!

JESUS.

As when the valleys all in shadow lie,
And shadowy shapes of fear still haunt the night,
Some mountain peak reflects the coming light,
And waiting lips break forth with joyful cry,
For gladness that the day at last is nigh—

* "America to England" and other Poems, by Minot J. Savage. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London. The Knickerbocker Press, 1905, pp. 208). 6s

So when some soul, that towers afar, is bright,
The souls that sit in shadow, at the sight
Grow sudden glad to know 'tis light on high!

And when these mountain-towering men can say,
"We see, though it be hidden from your eyes,"
We can believe in better things to be!
So, though the shadows still obscure our way,
We see the light, reflected from the skies,
That crowns thy brows, O Man of Galilee!

"FREE CHRISTIAN."

SIR,—Now that Mr. Wallace Bruce, in his important and responsible position as president of the Provincial Assembly, has re-opened the question of our denominational name, and has deliberately given his vote in favour of alteration, it will not be thought improper if those who have taken advantage of the "truce of silence" on the subject to think it over again try to approach the matter in a fresh way. One thing I hope we have learnt even from the fact that it was possible so unitedly to "shelve" such an important question, and yet to retain an arrière pensée that it was only shelved and not settled. The thing we have learnt in that connection is, I hope, that whatever is done will have to be done by our body as a whole, and not in anarchical detachments. This is a considerable gain. But for myself (and I think my own case is not singular), I have to confess a complete change of view. Some years ago, when Mr. Fripp was conducting his doughty campaign, I remained unconvinced, and clung to the old name, because I believed that its unfortunate associations in the popular mind could be, and were being, removed. The tide would turn, new adjustments of theological affinities would give opportunity for clearer explanation and understanding, and then the truth would come into its own. But further experience has gradually altered the denominational outlook, and, while changes have come thick and fast, they have been on a wider and grander scale than we could have foreseen. So now I am a penitent, and am willing to stand in a white sheet in any place within the purview of the Essex Hall Year-Book which Mr. Fripp would like to appoint.

It is not only that the name "Unitarian" is misunderstood and shied at by the multitude. We must also confess (1) that it neither truly indicates our general attitude, nor (2) correctly names our particular beliefs and negations.

(1) Three men out of four who come to us from outside are concerned rather with the disagreement between orthodox notions and a modern scientific or evolutionary view of the universe, than with the purely theological controversies out of which the name "Unitarian" arose. If, again, "Eternal punishment" has been their difficulty, the humanitarian grounds upon which they reject it have little to do with metaphysical doubts as to the Athanasian Trinity, and they have probably never heard of such other substitutes for orthodoxy as Sabellianism or Arianism. When, therefore, they have made the change, what a roundabout explanation is needed to make "Unitarian" seem natural in their case. And for the other people who have not got so far as to inquire about us, the bewilderment of mind they display is as extreme as our own, when we, in our turn, try to fathom the "non-natural" sense which Broad Churchmen give to the Articles.

(2) The name does not correctly represent our particular beliefs. For "Unitarian" is strictly true as a name for Mohammedans and Jews, and therefore has no very distinct significance for our own position. This is, perhaps, not a very important point, but it tells heavily against those who argue for the name on account of its supposed accuracy.

Again, the name does not indicate our negations. A man might be a Unitarian, and yet believe in Eternal Punishment, the Infallibility of the Bible, and the Deity of Christ ("Jesus is the only God" is the well-known formula of a certain theology which rejects the orthodox Trinity).

If, then, the name is a hindrance to us, and is also inexact, shall we not reconsider the whole matter? Even apart from the name, we are struggling against fearful odds. There is not, I believe, a worthier, more earnest body of men existing than my brother ministers, more ready to take the field in any high and forlorn cause, more willing to suffer hardship and noble poverty. But they cannot go on for ever under the present conditions. And our best are falling rapidly. We have been hard hit of late—Armstrong, Harvie, Cogan Conway, Lyttle, Dean. And the rest of us would see some good thing wrought before we too go hence. But let there be no sectional action. Let it be proposed at the B. and F. U. A. autumnal meetings, at all our district meetings, and next April at the Triennial Conference that we give up once and for all, in any and every use, the word "Unitarian," and substitute for it the noble and expressive "Free Christian." That name is already in use in many of our churches. It was Martineau's word. I will never be a party to ask individual congregations to break away in this matter. But if our leading institutions will really lead, they will be followed.

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

SIR,—The report of the Public Questions Committee, which the Provincial Assembly decided almost unanimously merely to receive, contains sentiments which are most distasteful to all but hot political partisans, and, under cover of soft words about peace, tries to throw a bomb-shell of discord into a meeting called for mutual intercourse and sympathy. The very raw political feeling was shown by such expressions as "that the conditions under which the Chinese coolies are maintained bear a strong likeness to slavery"; "this reversal of the best traditions of humane British rule." It was further shown by an "appeal to our churches to crush the war spirit," being intended as a counter-blast to the patriotic warnings of Earl Roberts and ignoring the object-lesson enacted in the Far East. Law was laid down as to the earnings of agricultural labourers, as to the education question, as to temperance, as to animals, and as to aliens—all in the style of the political manifesto, but remedies (following the model) appeared not. Was it not very generous of the Assembly to even receive such a document? And here I would venture to enter my earnest protest against the intrusion of such extraneous matter into the small field usefully designed for mutual fellowship. It must be that Unitarians are of differing judgment upon public questions, but there is no need to mix them up with Unitarianism.

ARMYTAGE BAKEWELL.

"ASSOCIATION SUNDAY."

SIR,—Will you allow me the courtesy of your columns to direct the attention of your readers to the Collections which will be taken in a large number of our churches on Sunday, November 19, on behalf of the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association?

The report of the Committee which appeared in THE INQUIRER last week is sufficient evidence of the important and varied work undertaken by the Association. These annual collections offer an excellent opportunity for saying something about what is being done by the Association at home and abroad for the maintenance and extension of the principles and faith of Unitarians.

Last year 227 congregations had collections, and the sum of £560 was received. I hope there will be an increase this year. There are a few congregations absent from the list that one would like to see included. Perhaps if the members of these churches would read the booklet on "The History and Work of the Association" they might then be induced to have a collection. Copies of the booklet will be supplied on application to the secretary at Essex Hall.

There are probably among your readers many Unitarians who are not attached to any congregation, and to these I would make a special appeal to become subscribers, if their names are not already on the list. Death has unfortunately removed from the list during the past year many generous supporters. Will not others come forward and take their places?

CHRISTIANITY AND NON-CHRISTIAN THOUGHT.

SIR,—In your interesting leader, termed "A Moral Challenge," you state the relation of Christianity to non-Christian thought as follows:—"But for the last eight hundred years Christianity has been unaffected by the thought of other religions. Great changes have taken place in Christian thought and feeling, but they have been produced by men inside the Christian world.'' The representation is unassailable, I think, as regards the past; but, quite apart from what we may term the Awakening of Japan, it would not, I feel, have represented more recent relations, while there seems to me almost daily increasing evidence that as intercourse with non-Christian peoples is becoming closer their thought and feelings are reacting on ourselves. Take, as an illustration, belief in Re-incarnation. Some Europeans—as, apparently, Wordsworth—held the theory years ago as a philosophic idea; but, since the closer contact with Hindu and Buddhistic thought, largely through the medium of theosophy, it has been much more widely entertained.

Take, again, ''The Doctrine of the Karma.'' There has, no doubt, always been, on the part of Christians, a tacit acknowledgment of the law of retribution; but, again, I imagine, the same Eastern influences have given a great impetus to the doctrine, and have brought it into more general recognition. In the same connection may we not further cite the oneness of all life, and, arising from it, respect for what we term the lower creation, and, as a result, greater kindness to sub-human animals? These are ideas native to India, which now, however, are becoming the common property of East and West. Some more illustrations of my position could probably be advanced.

E. L. MARE.

THERE need not be active wrong-doing to bring us into the accursed state. It is enough for that, that we be apathetic and inactive toward the world's miseries.—G. S. Merriam.

If I stoop
Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,
It is but for a time: I press God's lamp
Close to my breast; it's splendour, soon or late,
Will pierce the gloom: I shall emerge one day.

Browning's ''Paracelsus.''

PREACHING, to be effectual, must be as various as our nature. The sun warms at the same moment that it enlightens; and unless religious truth be addressed at once to the reason and the affections, unless it kindles whilst it guides, it is a useless splendour; it leaves the heart barren; it produces no fruits of godliness. Let the Christian minister, then, preach the Gospel with earnestness, with affection, with a heart warmed by his subject, not thinking of himself, nor seeking applause, but solicitous for the happiness of mankind, tenderly concerned for his people, awake to the solemnities of eternity, and deeply impressed with the worth of the human soul, with the glory and happiness to which it may be exalted, and with the misery and ruin into which it will be plunged by irreligion and vice. Let him preach, not to amuse but to convince and awaken; not to excite a momentary interest but a deep and lasting seriousness; not to make his hearers think of the preacher but of themselves, of their own characters and future condition.—Channing.

THE LATE REV. RICHARD LYTTLE.

THE following are among the many public tributes to the memory of our friend, of whom memorial notices have appeared in the last two numbers of THE INQUIRER:—''The Standing Committee of the Farmers' and Labourers' Union desire to express their deep and heartfelt grief at the sudden death of the Rev. Richard Lyttle. The simplicity and sincerity of his life, his unbending rectitude, his overflowing sympathy towards all men, his untiring devotion to great causes were daily evidenced to those who knew and loved him. No purer heart or finer spirit ever rested from his labours, and the memory of his short and broken life remains a dear and treasured memory to his friends. While we feel that we have to lament a colleague who cannot be replaced, we know that the country is the poorer by the loss of one who strove and laboured for his own people with a single aim and faithful heart, fearing no reproach, avoiding no toil, and hoping for no reward but the simple joy of duty faithfully accomplished.''—Resolution of Ulster Farmers' and Labourers' Union.

''The numbers who gathered to pay their respects to the memory of the deceased minister were a testimony to the esteem in which Mr. Lyttle was held. All creeds and classes were represented, for, though Mr. Lyttle was a man of decided views and no lukewarm adherent of the principles he professed, his unflinching honesty, his fairmindedness, and his kindliness of heart won him the respect and affection of many who in public life were his consistent opponents. The Irish Unitarian Church, in whose services he had laboured so zealously, and whose reputation he had so well upheld, was represented by its most prominent ecclesiastics and laymen, and there were also present ministers of almost every denomination in the city, for Mr. Lyttle was not one of those who imagine that loyalty to one's own church implies hostility to the creed of another. The generous enthusiasm which he had always shown in the cause of social reform was recalled by the number of leading temperance workers present, and the Ulster Farmers' and Labourers' Union, with which his name has been most intimately associated, showed its appreciation of his services by the presence of almost all the officials.''—The Northern Whig.

''Mr. Lyttle was a man who made friends everywhere he went, and who never lost one, even when political feeling ran high. His broadmindedness and consistency won the admiration of those who differed from him. Amongst his own people in Moneyrea he was held in the highest esteem, and his personal popularity elsewhere was very great. The active part which he played in the struggle for land reform, his zeal in the temperance cause, and his strong sympathy with the national aspirations of Ireland will earn undying honour for his memory.''—Belfast Morning News.

[The Rev. C. Peach, who is collecting pulpit-references and Press notices for preservation in a small memorial pamphlet, will be glad to receive marked copies of newspapers referring to the late Rev. R. Lyttle.]

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

TEMPERANCE.

THE Earl of Carlisle, President of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, has addressed this letter to the children in our schools and congregations:

1, Palace-green, Kensington,
Oct. 10, 1905.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS,—I am writing to urge you to join a ''Band of Hope''—if you have not done so already.

I hope that you are now taught, or that you soon will be, in your schools, ''temperance physiology,'' and that you will learn from these lessons the real nature of alcohol; and that, if you never acquire the habit of wanting it, you will avoid endless dangers to the health, both of your body and mind.

But it is not only your own healths that you will benefit by becoming and remaining abstainers from the habit of drinking; you will learn in the Bands of Hope how much misery is caused to families, and how much harm to our country by this habit of drinking.

Just one hundred years ago, at the Battle of Trafalgar, at the moment when the safety of our country was to be secured, Nelson made the signal:—

''England expects every man to do his duty.''

Those words have stirred the hearts and spirits of his countrymen ever since; but it is idle to praise the dead hero and to celebrate his Centenary unless we do something, as far as we are able, to act in the spirit of his message.

By becoming members of a temperance body you will be fighting against an enemy to your country, and you will so be ''doing your duty,'' and, at the same time, you will be making yourselves fitter and more able to do any other duty, or to meet any danger that may come in your way.

I believe that when you hear of brave or self-sacrificing deeds, you often wish that you yourselves might have the chance of showing that you could dare, or suffer, to save a life or serve a friend.

The opportunities of such heroisms may not come to you: if they did, you would be better prepared to show yourselves worthy of them if you were made strong by the habit of temperance. In any case, by joining in the work of a temperance society you will be helping to save lives and to diminish sorrows and misfortunes as truly, if in a smaller way, as those whose courage you have admired and whose opportunities you may have envied.

Your sincere friend,

CARLISLE.

That is a letter worth thinking about. And I hope those of you who have Young Days every month always read the pages on temperance matters which it contains. Children who wish to grow up strong and healthy, and to live wholesome happy lives, should have nothing to do with intoxicating drinks.

JUST so far as the idea of mutual service is accepted intelligently and gladly, so far things come upon their right footing, and society is harmonised and ennobled.—G. S. Merriam.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN HOLLAND.

OUR readers will find, we trust, some interest in the report here presented of the meeting of the Netherlands Protestantenbond, which it was the privilege of the Editor of this journal to attend last week as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

While we are so near to our brethren of the Liberal Faith in the Netherlands in spiritual sympathy and intellectual outlook upon the world, and in ideals of religious work, their ecclesiastical position is very different from ours. We, as Unitarians, are shut out from fellowship with liberals in the other churches of this country, but our brethren of the Protestantenbond are drawn from all the chief Protestant Churches of the Netherlands, not only the Reformed Church, the old established Church of the land, to which the majority belong, but from the Lutheran, the Remonstrant, and the Mennonite Churches, and from such independent congregations as the Vrije Gemeente of Amsterdam. Thus the Union draws together the leaders, at any rate, of all the forces of religious liberalism, although, as Professor EERDMANS noted in his presidential address, there are still large numbers of liberals who have not joined the Union, and take no part in the work of furthering its principles, or in its endeavours for the intellectual and moral uplifting of the people. It will be seen from the report what efforts are being made to further consolidate the forces of liberalism, and to rouse the apathetic to more active loyalty.

Two congratulations we would add here, one to the members of the Postal Mission, on the completion of ten years of devoted work; the other to the supporters of the Mission at Leiden, which is a centre of district nursing, religious instruction and worship, and other helpful activities. The workers at this Mission, in which Professor OORT has from the first been deeply interested, had recently to face the loss of the large annual donation of the late Mr. JANSSEN, on which so much of the good work depended; but they have succeeded in securing new subscribers, so that the Mission may still be maintained at the old level of efficiency. So may it be in every branch of the work of the Protestantenbond!

THE PROTESTANTENBOND.

ANNUAL MEETING AT BUSSUM.

THE thirty-fifth annual meeting of the Netherlands Protestantenbond, the union of liberals gathered from all the Dutch Protestant Churches, was held at Bussum on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 31 and November 1, under the presidency of Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden.

Bussum is a little town of some 10,000 inhabitants, and though more than fourteen miles to the south west of Amsterdam, it is practically a residential suburb of that city. Close by is the old walled town of Naarden, which, in 1572, was burnt by the Spaniards, almost the entire population, by an act of heartless treachery, being cruelly massacred. The fine old church, with its high vaulted roof, covered with curious paintings, remains, and there the religious service of the Protestantenbond was held. The two places are connected by a steam-tram, and a special train of some six or seven coaches took the bulk of the congregation back to Bussum after the service. Naarden is still surrounded by a moat, and the old walls and earth-works. From the northern ramparts there is a fine view of the Zuyder Zee, close at hand.

Pleasant sunny weather favoured the meetings last week, and the beech trees, which abound in the grounds of the villas and along the quiet roads at Bussum, were bright with autumn colours. The local committee of Bussum-Naarden had made admirable arrangements, and the happiest spirit prevailed. About 140 delegates and ministers from all parts of the country were present, and a congregation of nearly 500 was present in the Naarden Church, while the evening meeting was also largely attended. There were two foreign delegates present, the Rev. Dr. Scipio, of Stettin, representing the German Protestantenverein, and the Rev. V. D. Davis, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. They received a most cordial welcome. Another delegate, who had come a much greater distance, was Mr. A. S. Carpentier Alting, of Batavia, representing a new branch of the Union, the first to be formed in the Dutch East Indies.

The two days' programme included two long sessions of the business meeting; on Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning and afternoon (with an interval for lunch) in the concert-hall "Concordia," at Bussum, the religious service on Tuesday evening in the Naarden Church, followed by a social gathering in the Hôtel Nieuw-Bussum, where a good many of the members were staying; then on Wednesday evening a festive dinner at the hotel, and a public meeting in the large hall of the "Concordia." It is in a smaller hall in this building that the Bussum branch of the Protestantenbond holds regular Sunday morning services, and Mr. J. van Loenen Martinet, editor of the Hervorming, who lives at Bussum, preaches every other Sunday.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The PRESIDENT, Professor EERDMANS, opened the business meeting with an address, in which he spoke hopefully of the work, for the report of the committee (which had been printed and circulated beforehand) recorded an increase of membership from 18,170 to 18,785, while the number of branches of the Union was increased by 6, standing now at 163. The inclusion for the first time of a Colonial branch at Batavia was noted with special satisfaction. The number of children in the Sunday-schools was estimated at about 35,000. At the same time the president called attention to the fact that their progress depended too largely on the devoted services of a comparatively small number of their members, and pleaded that the cause of liberal religion ought to command the active loyalty of a much greater number. Estimating the number of liberals in the various churches of the Netherlands, he held that instead of 18,000 they might easily have 40,000 members in their Union, if only an active sense of duty and of the urgency of their cause could be brought home to the people. While it was undoubtedly most desirable to reach the masses of the people, and to that end the publication of cheap popular literature, and every kind of good social work was to be encouraged, he yet held that there was a still greater urgency in the need to keep a hold upon the educated classes in their country, among whom indifference to religion and the low aims of materialism so largely prevailed. To convince these people of the reality of religion he thought there was need to bring their services and their religious teaching into more perfect accord with present-day thought. With an exhortation to earnestness of purpose and unity in the love of their cause, he declared the thirty-fifth annual meeting opened.

Turning then to the English visitor, he addressed him in his own tongue, welcoming him as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and as editor of THE INQUIRER. "In editing your weekly paper," Dr. Eerdmans said, "you are not only working for the sake of people of the English tongue, but you are promoting our common aims. Your work is much valued by the members of the Protestantenbond. Your Association and our Union have the same basis of religious belief, working for one universal religion for mankind, full of devotion to God and good-will to men. We see the present world full of religious controversy and political mischief. We know that the only way to a better future is the way of international intercourse and friendship. It is beyond the power of a single nation to create an era of peace and honesty. That is to be done by all nations together. They will not be able to conquer the world for the Kingdom of God, if the congenial spirits of different lands do not try to gain their people for the true service of the living God. Your coming here to us is a symbol of international friendship between fellow-workers and fellow-thinkers. A hearty welcome to you."

To the Rev. Dr. Scipio, of Stettin, representative of the German Protestantenverein, who had just arrived, and came into the hall after the meeting had begun, the president also offered a cordial welcome in German, and the regular business then proceeded. The opportunity of the visitors to respond came afterwards, at the Wednesday evening meeting.

The roll of the delegates attending having been called by the secretary, Dr. C. J. Niemeijer, the report of the General Committee, and the reports of the eight special committees, charged with various branches of the work, were brought up in turn, special points were raised, and the reports adopted. So also with the treasurer's accounts. We cannot attempt here any report of the business, but simply note two or three matters of special interest.

We noted in our report of the meeting of the Union at Zutfen two years ago that a generous contribution of 10,000 florins annually for ten years from Mr. Janssen, of Amsterdam, which had led to an extension of work in several directions, would come to an end this year, and that the Union was faced with the necessity of finding other sources of income, if the work, in providing religious teachers, supporting weak branches, and in other directions (including the Postal Mission), was to be continued at the same level of efficiency. Mr. Janssen died not long after the Zutfen meeting, but his widow made such further gifts as secured the efficiency of the work up to the present year. Now, however, the Committee has to find other means of meeting the various claims, and this determined to some extent the budget for next year. Some of the branches, where very little life has been manifested, are no longer to receive financial support, but in other directions, as in the case of the Postal Mission, it is confidently expected that new and increased subscriptions for that special work will meet the need. One happy instance of this awakening of fresh interest was reported from Leiden, where the mission had secured new subscribers to make good the loss of the Janssen donation.

The General Committee in their budget did not again propose a grant of 100 florins to the popular weekly paper Nieuw Leven, which it has to that extent supported for the past 18 years; this was omitted on the ground of economy, and also because the paper, with a circulation of some 9,000, was not really in need of financial support. Professor Knappert, however, proposed an amendment that the 100 florins be granted, and a similar sum to the Blijde Wereld, a Christian socialist weekly edited by three young ministers in Friesland. There was a long discussion, and finally it was agreed by a majority of one, 52 votes against 51, that the Union should cease its direct support of Nieuw Leven. On the other hand, the Blijde Wereld, which has a much smaller circulation, and really needed the help, got its 100 florins.

Another eager discussion took place over the proposal of Mr. Zwaardemaker, of Bussum, on behalf of the Committee, that the Union should publish a little monthly paper of popular appeal, and distinctly propagandist in tone, which should be distributed gratis to the members and friends. A circulation of 20,000 monthly was contemplated, and Mr. Zwaardemaker had printed a specimen copy, which was distributed in the meeting, to show what was intended. Some fear was expressed that the free distribution of such a paper (a large four-page leaflet) every month might injure the circulation of the weekly Hervorming; but this view was not shared by Mr. van Loenen Martinet, the editor, who thought, on the other hand, that fresh interest might be roused in the more solid and literary paper. Another view was that such a popular paper would be obliged to take sides on theological and social questions on which members of the Union were much divided, and would thus promote discord rather than union; and it was also suggested that local papers in each district, of which two or three already exist, might be more effective; but these objections did not prevail. Finally, by a vote of 73 against 28, it was agreed that the Committee should be empowered to arrange for the publication of such a monthly paper for a year; and for the expense, which was estimated at 3,900 florins (about 4d. a month for each of the 18,000 members), to draw upon the capital of the Union. It was expected, as we understood, that after all the arrangements had been made, in finding an editor, arranging for so elaborate a distribution, &c., the Committee would not be able to do more than produce a first number before the next annual meeting, and that the matter would then come up again for further consideration, in connection with the budget.

The report of the Postal Mission, presented by Miss van Eck (whom many of our readers will remember at our Whitsuntide Meetings, and at Geneva) was very warmly received. The Postal Mission in Holland has now had ten years' experience of the work, and Miss van Eck and another lady, Miss A. Meijer, are the only two remaining members of the original Committee. The report spoke with great earnestness and enthusiasm of the results of the work, which had been quite unexpectedly successful, and had evidently met a deep need in the life of the people. Miss van Eck also spoke of the new insight into life and the delight it had brought to the workers themselves, in the power of helping lonely, sorrowful, and hungry souls, and the happy friendships to which it had given rise. In the ten years they had distributed over 34,000 books and pamphlets, in over 11,000 parcels, and had written nearly as many letters. Although they were obliged now to do without the Janssen donation, she was confident that their work, which was so fruitful of blessing, would not be crippled for the lack of the necessary means.

Another report was presented by Dr. C. E. Hooykaas, on the new popular edition of the Leiden translation of the Old Testament, which was issued some few years ago, with elaborate introduction and notes, by Professor H. Oort, completing the work, in which several distinguished scholars, Kuenen, Kosters, and J. Hooykaas had been engaged with him, but had not lived to finish. Two thousand copies of the original edition had been sold, and it is hoped that this popular edition, with the introduction and notes much curtailed, will lead to a further demand for the complete work, which is a great achievement of modern scholarship. The popular edition is being issued in monthly parts, under Professor Oort's supervision (the first part is already published) and is to be completed in about two years at a cost of 6 florins. It was objected at the meeting that this was hardly a popular price, and it was finally agreed that the Committee should arrange with the publishers, if possible, to take 1,000 copies of the work, to be available for members at 3·50 florins a copy. It is hoped that the book will thus secure a much wider distribution, and succeed, as it is so well fitted to do, in making the Old Testament once more a living book in the homes of thoughtful people.

After these reports and the discussion on the proposed popular monthly paper, Mr. J. van Drooge, of Dordrecht, read a very interesting paper on "The Legal Regulation of Sunday Rest," which was followed by discussion. He took a broad view of the subject, pleading earnestly for efforts to secure, as far as possible, a true day of rest, with opportunity for healthy recreation, and the pursuit of high interests, apart from money-getting. While admitting that many people were obliged to work on Sundays for the sake of others, as in the railway service, and the lighting of cities, he held that to everyone so obliged to work another day of rest during the week ought to be secured.

The last item of business was to fix where next year's meeting should be held. Three invitations were received—from Bolsward, Zwolle, and Groningen, and each was eloquently enforced. By a large majority it was agreed to meet at Groningen.

Dr. C. J. Niemeijer, who has been secretary of the Union for the past six years, is obliged by the constitution to retire this year, and very warm acknowledgment was made of the services he has rendered during his term of office. Dr. I. M. J. Hoog, of Nijmegen, was elected in his place. Mr. Zwaardemaker also had to retire from the general committee, and in his place Mr. J. W. de Kanter, of Scheveningen, was elected. The treasurer is Mr. W. J. Pekelharing, of Amsterdam, who last year succeeded Miss von Berlekom in that office. Professor Eerdmans remains president of the Union.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

It was a strange experience to drive across from Bussum to Naarden on the quiet autumn evening, for service in the great church. It is not much more than a mile to the old town, and then the road, after skirting the moat for some distance, crosses a bridge, and enters through a narrow gateway. There, just within the walls, is a monument to Comenius, the seventeenth century educational reformer, who died at Amsterdam, and for some unknown reason was buried at Naarden, in the Walloon Church, which has now disappeared. Through narrow streets one comes first to the Town Hall, built after the destruction of the town by the Spaniards in 1572, and then to the old church. Memories of that awful tragedy, and of the heroic endurance of the people through those years of agony, till their freedom from the Spanish tyranny was won, could not but blend with the sense of happy fellowship in that gathering for peaceful worship.

Though they have electric light in Naarden, the church is lighted only by oil lamps, and the lofty spaces and noble form of the great building were very impressive. The large congregation was gathered about the pulpit, and the voices of the choir, accompanied by the fine organ, came from a further distance. First a hymn for men's voices alone, "The House of the Lord," then another hymn of aspiration by the whole choir, and, after an earnest prayer, the preacher, the Rev. A. W. van Wijk, of Zwolle, announced his text, Neh. viii. 10: "The joy of the Lord is your strength"; but, before he began his sermon, the whole congregation sang a verse of a hymn of thanksgiving, and again in the middle of the sermon another verse. At the close, the choir, with an exquisite soprano voice in the solo, sang a prayer from Beethoven, and another verse of a hymn and the Benediction concluded the service.

The sermon was an earnest appeal of sustained eloquence for a fuller realising of the joy of our life with God. They were met, the preacher said, as their custom was, on the Reformation Day, when Luther nailed his theses to the church door at Wittenberg, and they did well to connect the celebration of their Union meetings with thoughts of those great days. Yet, while they were thankful for what the Reformation had given, their real concern was with the present, what God was revealing to them now. They gave thanks for present blessings, though they had their roots in the past. Their joy, their strength, was in their present knowledge of God and the inspiration of His Spirit. There was but one Fountain of Truth. With childlike heart they must gain more and more insight into the Father's heart. In the supreme life, at the beginning of Christian history, they saw the ideal towards which they were striving. They spoke the great words of faith in God, the Father, and His kingdom of truth, purity and love, but felt how far short they were of realising all that was meant. In the life of Jesus, in his faith, his communion with God, the strength and joy of his spirit, his self-sacrificing love they saw that to which they were to attain. In moments of highest insight they realised it, and their whole endeavour must be to attain to that true life with God. No difficulties or discouragements should hinder them. They were in the Father's house. The Father's hand was leading them on. They must overcome the evil, first in themselves and then in the world around them. In God was their strength, leading them out of darkness and mistrust, into His perfect light.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

The business meeting, concluded on Wednesday afternoon, was followed by the dinner, of which about a hundred delegates partook, in the Hôtel Nieuw-Bussum. Amongst the loyal and other toasts were two, very heartily received, to the foreign visitors, proposed each in his own language, that of the English guest by the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam. The President, Dr. Eerdmans, was in the chair, and very warm acknowledgment was made to the local committee for their admirable arrangements.

Then followed a public meeting in the large hall of the "Concordia," over which Mr. A. L. W. Seyffardt, of The Hague, formerly Minister of War, presided. The speeches were interspersed with music by a large choir, some of the choruses being for men's voices only, the "Wiegenlied" of Brahms especially being very beautifully sung by them, and encored. Hymns were also sung by the whole assembly.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, gave a retrospect of the past ten years of their work, showing the progress that had been made, over a thousand increase in their membership, and fresh methods of work, giving many interesting details of what is done by the various committees. It might prove to be necessary, he said, to appoint a secretary who could give his whole time to their work, admirable and devoted as had been the work of their secretaries in the past. He also paid a tribute to the Mennonites, whose ministry is open to women as well as men, and thought that other bodies might with advantage follow that example. He concluded with an earnest exhortation to more strenuous work.

Then followed, after a hymn sung by the whole assembly, a renewed greeting of the German and English visitors.

The Rev. Dr. SCIPIO, of Stettin, speaking in German, presented the greetings of the Protestantenverein, and warmly acknowledged the welcome he had received. They owed much to the Liberals of Holland, he said, and felt the unity of their aims and aspirations. He referred to the difficulties they had to face in Germany, and especially to the case of Dr. Max Fischer, of Berlin, as showing the strength of the bigotry ranged against them. It was a great pleasure and encouragement to have the sympathy and fellowship of Liberals in other countries.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS also acknowledged the welcome accorded to him, and presented the greetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The beginning and end of his speech were in Dutch (which friends were good enough to say afterwards they really understood) and the rest in English. He spoke of the unity of spirit and of purpose which united their unions, in Holland and England, and of the mutual indebtedness they felt to the other's leaders. He recalled the memory of the late Richard Armstrong, who four years ago had attended the meeting of the Protestantenbond at Utrecht, and two years ago was at Amsterdam, and then spoke of the work of his Association, the popular editions of such books as Armstrong's "God and the Soul" and Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," and of the encouragement their work had received from its greatly increased income, the £1,000 of one generous subscriber calling out the generosity of others in another £2,000 of income. In conclusion he quoted some sentences from the declaration of principles of the Protestantenbond, with the motto, "Free and Independent Piety," and the motto over the door of Manchester College, "To Truth, to Liberty, to Religion," as showing the unity of their aims, and concluded with the word of Godspeed to them in their work.

Two other addresses followed. The Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet gave an eloquent account of the international meetings at Geneva, at which Holland was so well represented, and the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz spoke on "Three Great Protestants: Calvin, Rousseau, and Vinet." Neither the dogmatism of Calvin, nor the naturalism of Rousseau, Mr. Hugenholtz said, could represent their position, but in Alexander Vinet they recognised one much more nearly akin to them in principles and aims. The statue of Vinet at Lausanne bore the inscriptions: "Christianity is in the world the immortal seed of liberty," "I wish man to be master of himself, that he may the better be the servant of all." Those sayings marked him as of like spirit with themselves. So Vinet could lead them to the true personal, social, and religious life. That is a good thought with which to conclude this report of a series of most successful meetings.

JESUS AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.*

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

"Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life, and we have believed and know that thou art the holy one of God" (John vi. 68).

WHAT I ask you to consider with me to-day is our relationship to Jesus and the duty of the Christian Church. There can be no question that the Christian Church came into being under the influence of Jesus and that, however much his teachings may have been misinterpreted, he has from the beginning till now been its central personality, and the living force which has given it unity. The Christian Church, apart from any doctrines about him, might surely say that "he is the Master light of all our seeing, The fountain light of all our day." We, as fully as any other denomination, belong to the Christian Church and owe our existence to him. We liberal Christians are not founding a new Church independently of the long history of Christian thought and Christian effort. What Professor Henry Jones, in the Hibbert Journal, said of the true social reformer applies equally to religious reformers. "Trust in the good that is in the world, loyalty towards the society he would raise to a higher level of well-being, seem to me to be cardinal qualities of the reformer's faith. His attitude towards society is never negative. The great reformers came to fulfil, not to destroy." That is equally true of reformers in religion as it is of reformers in society. We sometimes talk of reforming the Christian Church from the outside. What we mean is that we are trying to reform it from outside this or the other creed-bound sect. But to attempt to reform it without an understanding of the great Christian principles, without sympathy for all that is best in Christian history, without love and reverence for Christ, without a sense of unity with the great stream of thought and moral effort and religious faith which took its historic birth with Jesus, is an impossible attempt. A Buddhist standing outside may help us to see and know ourselves; he may reveal to us our weakness and inconsistency; he may help us to be ashamed of ourselves, and to make a new effort to realise the best in Christianity; but he cannot reform Christianity for us. That can only be done by those who are within the Christian Church. And we of the liberal Christian faith are as much within the Christian Church as any other more "orthodox" branch.

Even amongst agnostics and secularists you will still find a real, if often unconscious, reverence for and faith in Christianity, and a sense of relationship with it. What is it that the masses outside all the churches are blaming the churches for to-day? Is it that the churches are too Christian, too full of reverence for Jesus, too full of obedience to his principles, and too devoted followers of his life? Is it that they say all this is worn out and done with? It is the reverse of this. "You have not been true to the teachings of the Master you profess to love; you are without his charity and courage, you call him Lord, Lord, and do not the things which he says." That is what they urge. It is not Christianity which is condemned by those who do not go to church. It is the un-Christlike professing Christians. "There is something touching," says Harnack, "in the anxiety which everyone shows to re-discover himself, together with his own point of view, in this Jesus Christ, or at least to get a share of him. The Mystic, the Socialist, the Tolstoian, the Theosophist, the Optimist, the Calvinist, the Philosopher—all claim Jesus as their own." There is no general desire in any large section of the English race to separate themselves from Christ. What we blame each other for is that we are not Christian enough. When every church is more impressed and more humbled by its own lack of Christianity than by its neighbour's lack we shall be on the high road to reform. "That the Christian ideal of moral excellence is splendid, even unsurpassed, no one doubts," says Mr. Jacks. For my own part, I would not subscribe to the words of Goethe when he says, "Let intellect and spiritual culture progress and the human mind expand as much as it will: beyond the grandeur of Christianity as it sparkles and shines in the Gospels the human mind will not advance." It is not for us to set bounds and limits to what humanity may conceive, or do, or become in the thousands and tens of thousands of years that lie before it. God may send teachers and leaders as great as the greatest in the past, giving an even fuller knowledge of His nature, and even wider and deeper apprehension of His will. It is enough for us if we, without fore-closing the future, feel that we belong to the great historic stream of Christian effort, Christian thought, and Christian ideals, looking unto Jesus the author—not the finisher—of our faith, and pressing towards the mark of our high calling of God in him.

Further, we must remember in any religious view of history, that is, in any view which sees a meaning in history, that Jesus was not a chance product of blind causes, a personality turning up unintentionally and without significance. The fact that he did what he did, that the Christian Church was the result of his teaching and his life and death, that his influence through his disciples was the beginning of Western civilisation, and the break up of an ancient system, is not unimportant. It is of intense and vital importance. It was the result of the divine mind and love working in history.

The world has not exaggerated the importance of Jesus. The Christian Church is not all a mistake. It may have misunderstood and misinterpreted much, but it has not been loving and revering one who was unworthy of its love. It has not made a mistake with regard to its true leader, however much it may have mistaken his meaning. The instinct of the Western world for Christ's greatness and significance was right, although its understanding of his message and his life may often have been at fault. "It is most important," says Dr. Harnack, "to remind men again and again that a man of the name of Jesus Christ once stood in their midst." His whole contention with all its freedom of gospel criticism, with all its rejection of the marvellous, with all its complete confidence in the supreme naturalness of Jesus, is an assertion of the central importance of the life and teaching of Jesus for the Christian Church. In saying this we have to guard ourselves against misunderstanding. Emerson complains, and rightly complains, of a nauseous iteration of the name of Christ. Many of us, if quite sincere, would confess the same. Such iteration is only nauseous and wearisome when it is the iteration of those without understanding and love for this great and holy life, of those who are without his spirit, of those who think of him as above man, not the revealer of man. No one ever spoke of Jesus too much when he spoke with simple love and reverence, and with longing to be one with God as Jesus was one with Him. And, further, no love or reverence for Christ interferes with the relation of the soul to God. We speak sometimes as if great reverence for Christ was the interposition of a lesser god between man and his Maker. That is surely to misunderstand the call and the influence of Christ. It is not in that way that we think of our mother or of some noble friend as hindrances. You cannot love and reverence any great and holy soul too much. We may slavishly follow them, we may yield up our reason and our conscience to them, and let them dominate our thought and life. But that is not their highest influence and help. We do not really reverence them in such a way. They reveal us to ourselves; they reveal God to us. Through them we learn to live in more immediate relationship with the Eternal. The Christian Church might be described as composed of friends of Christ, men and women who regard his principles as practicable, men and women who feel the divinity of man, which first was impressed upon the Christian Church through belief in his divinity, men and women who work and pray for the coming of the Kingdom of God.

The notes of the Christian Church from the beginning through all its diversities of creed and form seem to me to be two—a belief in the divinity of Jesus and a belief in the principles of his teachings as the way of life for individuals and for nations.

God forbid that we should set up any creed which should exclude devout, sincere religious men, even based on reverence for Christ. We might imagine Jesus saying to anyone who did this—"Man, who made me a judge and a divider?" It is to the love and obedience of God he urged his followers. And in such love and obedience we are his disciples, whether we use his name or not. At the same time, interpreted in the broadest possible way, I cannot see what there is to repel any man in these two notes of the Christian Church: A belief in the divinity of Christ means a belief that God reveals something of His own nature in the life and love of the greatest and holiest of men. It means that we believe in God's revelation of Himself through human personality. In the greatest and best of the sons of men, in their joy, their spirituality, their love, we see an indication of the character of the ultimate reality in the Universe. We see in Jesus, and those like him, not merely a revelation of the goodness of man, but a revelation of the will and thought, and nature of God.

There is nothing unreasonable or forced about such a conclusion. Everybody has some sort of idea of ultimate reality. The materialist gets his idea of God from matter and its laws. This seems to him the all-powerful and final reality from which all comes, and into which all is resolved. The idealist gets his highest and clearest idea of God from thought. That seems to him the pervading reality from which all comes, and into which all is resolved. The Christian gets his highest and clearest idea of God from Christ and Christ-like men. His conscience speaks to him of a moral imperative, his reason shows him unity of thought, one connected intellectual plan through all things whose meaning is beyond his understanding. His own relationship to the Eternal, his joy, his sorrows, his prayers, and even his sufferings and sins teach him something of the peace and joy at the heart of things, and bring him into personal relationship with the divine. But beyond all this, one main element in his faith is the revelation of the Father through the greatest and the best of human beings. In Christ and Christ-like men I place my trust.

It is sometimes said that the influence of great personalities is past, and that we do not need personal leaders and inspirers as once we did. Rather I would say that in this crowded, complex world, where our great cities are so full of human life, looking so cheap, so sordid, so meaningless, we need this influence of personality more than ever. And this, chiefly, not for moral guidance, but in order to reveal the divinity of man. Never was the temptation greater to think meanly of man, to disbelieve in his immortality, to regard him as a little better than the beasts rather than a little lower than the angels. To see men in masses is to see them superficially. It sounds a paradox, but it is a great truth, says Professor Caird, that "the most individual is the most universal." To love a man with all our heart is to know much more of the true nature of man and God than he who has lived among crowds all his life can ever discover. To know God as revealed through the highest and holiest life is to learn that no human life is unimportant, and is to feel within ourselves the real divinity of man. "The most lost cynic," says Professor Seely, "will get a new heart by learning thoroughly to believe in the virtue of one man. Our estimate of human nature is in proportion to the best specimen of it we have witnessed." Yes, and our estimate of God depends largely on the same experience. Many a man has lost faith in God through witnessing the sufferings of a child. I think, in that blank and overwhelming misery there is nothing which can bring us back hope and the beginnings of a deeper faith so naturally and impressively as the thought of the life and suffering of Jesus and of Christ-like men. It is not merely that he and they teach us how to be brave and to endure and to play the man; it is that somehow in their sufferings and sorrow, in their greatness and their beauty, we see the love of God. And thus we learn that through pain and agony the love of the Father is revealed.

And now, lastly, let me speak of the second note of the Christian Church—the belief in the moral principles of Jesus. "It is the supreme business of the Church," says Dr. Hunter, "and of the pulpit as the organ of the Church, to keep the ideal—the Christian ideal of life and duty before men." Jesus bade his disciples take up their cross and deny themselves; he bade them love and forgive one another; he bade them be pure in heart; he bade them heal the sick and care for the poor; he bade them seek first God's kingdom and His righteousness. As they listened to Jesus and lived with him their ideals of duty widened before them. They felt themselves called for a noble, self-denying, divine warfare against evil. A new life and hope and longing filled their souls. Life grew larger and more wonderful, at once more difficult and more delightful. There was something to be done with this little life of theirs of which they had never thought before. The service of God and man became to them no longer a matter of small conventions, of formal prayers and correct belief, of easy comfortable living, but a high and glorious trust. It became a great ideal to them of inward holiness and love, an ideal of courage to speak the truth and stand for righteousness, an ideal of faithful obedience to God's call, an ideal of self-devotion and brotherly love. That was the note of the early church, and must be the note of every church of Christ. It is the great condemnation of any church that its members do not really believe in the ideals of Jesus; that they are playing with them, sentimentally indulging in vapid admiration of them, instead of seriously realising them in their lives and in the world. Amidst the contradictions of the Christian ideal and the disregard of it, amidst the misery of the poor, the national hatreds and the selfish luxury and lust which are about us, what is the Christian Church doing?

I would bring no wholesale indictment against it. There are in it noble workers for God and man, and lovers of righteousness in all its branches. But we may surely feel that it is not fully sensible of the outrage upon Christian principles which the condition of the world presents to-day. The Christian Church ought to be able to say of itself in the words of Shelley, thinking of the established evils to which we so easily grow accustomed, and the silent wrongs which we so easily ignore—

"Me who am as a nerve o'er which do creep
The else unfelt oppressions of the earth."

It ought to be alive to the patient inarticulate misery of the world, the evils wrought by the indifferent and the selfish, to the wickedness of luxury, to the awfulness and horror of war; it ought to see what is going on in the light of God's love with something of the surprise and indignation and faith in good and heroic energy of Christ. We are too disinclined to speak out. A writer in the Spectator a few weeks ago made a demand upon the clergy which is significant of the wishes of the best laymen.

"There are no cobblers more loyally sticking to their lasts than those ministers of religion who seek to qualify themselves, individually and collectively, to advise and help those laity on whom they have influence as to the morality of the lines of action in which they find themselves required or tempted to indulge in the conduct of trade. Whether it will pay in the long run to make misrepresentations to customers, or to practise the giving and receiving of secret commissions—on these and like questions the Christian minister as such can have no expert opinion to offer, and should refrain from dogmatising. But as to whether such practices are morally justifiable and therefore compatible with the profession of a Christian, the Christian minister is bound to have, and on all suitable occasions, both publicly and privately, to express clear and definite opinions."

We run risk of offending people, of course, when we speak out, but there is no great work to be done without risks. Men go gladly into battle, risking life in the charge to capture the guns upon a height. The message floated from the mast-head of Nelson's ship—"England expects every man to do his duty"—fills every sailor of the fleet with an enthusiasm in which death seems as nothing. Are we going to have less courage in fighting for God at the command of Christ? In standing for righteousness and setting forth Christian ideals, it is not necessary to scold or to irritate or to harden men's hearts with a sense of the folly of the preacher and the absurdity of his message. The method of Nathan towards David is a lesson to every preacher. He spoke to what was noble in the heart. He awoke David's indignation against evil, and in doing so made him feel his own instinctive love of good and desire for justice; and then—and then only—in that moment of noble pity and anger, when David was deeply moved with a desire of seeing right prevail, he turned his thoughts upon himself with the words, "Thou art the man."

That preacher fails, if, when he is speaking of the injustice, the violence, the wrong about him, he does not evoke a response of noble anger in every heart, a longing for a higher and more Christ-like world. The application to ourselves will offend, and fail only if we have failed to touch that passion of pity and of anger and love which are in the heart of every child of God.

There are few things which fill me with more anger and with a sense of deeper mischief being wrought than the irresponsible slanders of some portions of the Press. If the liberty of the Press is to continue, the Churches must speak out. Even here, however, they will not succeed by scolding or bitterness. The Press is one of the greatest powers in the modern world. It is colouring men's thoughts, it is playing on the passions of men; it is giving them prejudices, convictions, ideals which they take in often unconsciously like microbes, and which will have fateful and infinitely important consequences upon national life. Many of the writers and editors are aware of their responsibility, and are a mighty influence for good. Few really wish to do harm. But when the alternative presents itself between saying something that will make the paper pay and the keeping silence for the sake of peace and for the good of nations, there are many who feel no moral ignominy, no disgrace, no shameful cowardice in thinking only of their own advantage. Anonymous attacks in the shape of libellous inflammatory articles about other nations, deepening prejudices, and making for the hatred which leads straight to war, ought to be condemned by the churches in the name of Christ. A man in private life who made a livelihood out of stirring up hatred between friends, who disseminated ill-natured gossip, who fostered misunderstandings, would be condemned by every healthy conscience. It is this which many writers in newspapers are doing to-day, only on a far larger scale, and with more dangerous results.

The Press, like the drama, is capable of being, and in part now is, one of the best influences of our time. All honour to those who have raised the tone and heightened the ideals of the theatre and the Press. They deserve well of their country. But the Christian Church must help them to realise that much is demanded of them, holding their portion of authority not in "wanton self-will, but reverently as of God; making it the stronghold of right, the refuge of the oppressed, the moderator of lawless ambition." The work of the Church is to hold up and to stand for the ideals of Christ, and to be the witness of divine things in all the world. It needs a wise and tender love with all the tact and insight and appreciation of the best in every man and every action which love alone can give. But it needs courage also, the courage which will hold to the ideals of Christ and trust them amidst the dangers and the confusions of life; it needs to be able to say with loyal devotion in the words of Peter, "Lord, to whom shall we go, thou hast the words of eternal life."

LOVE'S MEASURE.

If you would love's true measure take,
And know its breadth, its depth, its height,
Thus gauge it,—by how much delight
Love can forego for love's sweet sake!

'Tis not by outward sign alone
Love's sacred presence you may trace;
It by a hidden, secret grace
Is known: "Love seeketh not its own."

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE autumn meeting of this society was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, and was very well attended. The president, Mr. Hahnemann Epps, received the members and friends in the earlier part of the evening, which was pleasantly devoted to social intercourse, tea and coffee being served under the gallery. A musical programme was then rendered, under the direction of Mr. John Harrison, including five part songs by the ladies of the Effra-road Choir, and songs by Mr. D. Byndon-Ayres, which were much appreciated. Towards half-past eight the president took the chair, and Mr. G. H. Clennell, hon. secretary, announced among the letters of regret for absence, one from the Rev. H. Rawlings, who was to have spoken, and one from the Rev. Charles Roper, who is coming next month to Kilburn, and whom they would have been glad, Mr. Clennell said, on that occasion to have welcomed to London.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, spoke of his long connection with that society, having been a member of the committee for nearly 25 years, except for eight years, when he was one of the secretaries. As one who had not always been a Unitarian, he spoke of the changes that had taken place in religious thought during the past 55 years, since that society was founded, and referred to the intense relief of those who had been brought up under the terror of the old dogmas, when they gained their freedom, and the earnestness with which they desired others to share their happier faith. They had three aspirations, faith, freedom, and fellowship, and desired to do all they could to strengthen men in their trust in the Fatherhood of God and in human brotherhood. He noted some of the most remarkable of the changes which had taken place in the broadening of orthodox thought, and touched upon the significance of the International Meetings at Geneva, where the pulpit of Calvin was occupied by a Unitarian preacher. It gave them a new confidence in their hope for the ultimate union of mankind in a universal faith, as to which the last number of the Hibbert Journal was also a significant token of what was coming. They had a fine inheritance, he said in conclusion, and their responsibility was great. They must not relax any effort, but so order their work as to appeal to every class of society.

Mr. H. B. LAWFORD, president of the Laymen's Club, said that he had been asked to speak on "How to dispel the prevailing apathy," but he did not believe in it. During the last twenty years the Unitarianism of London had increased, and the point he wished to press was that they might do still more if they made more opportunities for meetings of a purely social character. The club he represented helped to encourage meetings of that kind, and he was glad to know that the committee of that society was contemplating the arrangement of similar social visits to various congregations in London. Such meetings, he believed, did real good.

Mr. GEORGE CALLOW having proposed a vote of thanks to the singers of that evening and to Mr. Harrison, which was carried by acclamation, the two young ministers, who have recently come over from the Wesleyan Methodist body and settled with London churches, spoke.

The Rev. A. HURN, of Acton, expressed his gratitude for the welcome he had received, and the sympathy shown to him since he came out from the ranks of Orthodoxy to Unitarianism. He thought it was a great office, which Unitarians fulfilled, in affording a refuge for those who were outcasts from all the sects, and found with them a spiritual home and opportunity for religious work. However far they departed from the old creeds, religion remained with them the dearest possession; they showed the world what it was to be open to all new light of science and philosophy, and yet retain a heart touched with religious zeal. They did also a grand social work, showing that the social question was a religious question. On that last point they ought now to lay more stress than ever. He then referred to his work at Acton, and expressed the hope that, as they had secured a site, they might soon be able to build a church upon it, and so go forward to do that work for man to which God had called them.

The Rev. A. F. G. FLETCHER, of Peckham, contrasted the church of his fathers and the church of his adoption. The one had a crude theology, but an almost perfect organisation for spreading it; the other had an almost perfect theology, an ideal creed, appealing to the depths of the human heart and the highest flights of the human mind, but connected with an organisation which, to say the least, was exceedingly faulty. Methodism in little over a century had grown to be one of the strongest churches in the world. The comparative feebleness of Unitarianism he attributed chiefly to its lack of adequate organisation. They were grateful for what their fathers had done, but the true way to show that gratitude was to build on their foundation. Only those who had come, as he had done, through much agony, into Unitarianism, knew its true value. They must unite together as one body and go forward. Now, he felt, was the appointed time. The one word on which he wished to lay stress was, Organise.

Dr. C. HERBERT SMITH was the last speaker, and his subject was the scheme, about which he wrote in last week's INQUIRER, to raise a "Boston Conference Fund," which shall enable those of our ministers who desire it to go to America to attend the International Council Meeting to be held in 1907 at Boston. The idea, he said, was going to be taken up with absolute enthusiasm by Unitarians throughout the country. They had their faults, but their virtues also, and one of their virtues was an extreme generosity. It was, no doubt, often very much misplaced. It should begin at home; and now they had an opportunity of showing how truly they appreciated the work of their ministers. The aim was not simply to benefit the ministers personally, but to benefit the whole denomination. They heard much at the present time of a new disease, with the expressive name of fiscalitis. He was going to invent another name for a new disease, and that was Genevitis, contracted while some of them were in Geneva this summer. He was one of those who had got it very badly, and he meant to spread it by attending crowded meetings throughout the country during the coming year. They had been astonished at the amount of enthusiasm manifested at the International Meetings at Geneva. He had often said that Unitarians were incapable of high enthusiasm, but that was a mistake. They might not have it in England, but they had felt it at Geneva, and notably those who heard the wonderful speech made by Père Hyacinthe. Even those who only partially understood, because it was in French, felt the kindling enthusiasm. Given the right note, Unitarians were as capable of enthusiasm as anybody. As to the scheme he had undertaken to carry through, he wanted a sufficient sum of money to enable every Unitarian minister, who could arrange it, to go over to the Boston Congress in 1907. He had not met with a single dissentient as yet. He proposed a central fund, but every congregation should form its own committee, and canvass among its own members, not, indeed, to send their own minister, but to help in the general effort. He did not think that a minister ought to feel indebted to his own congregation for such a gift. Yet it should be taken up as a congregational matter, and the strong congregations would feel that they were helping the weak, who could not possibly raise enough to send a minister out. Thus they would all feel united in a common effort. He was confident that the Laymen's Club would take the matter up in London. The country, of course, must take its own measures, but for his own part he should be prepared to go round to the different churches throughout the country, to explain the matter, and assist in any way that lay in his power. He did not wish that thing to be done by a few large donations by wealthy men; he wanted the people to give their half-crowns and five shillings. Another point he made was that no subscription list should be published, though, of course, the accounts would be properly audited. They might be sure that the effort was going to be an absolute success. He asked them in each of their chapels to try and get two or three would who form a local committee, and get it started this year. It was none too soon. That scheme had within it two most necessary things. It would strengthen the bond between ministers and laymen, and it would enable their whole body to feel that they were engaged in one common piece of work. He asked those who were willing to help to communicate with him, and he was ready to give any information on the subject they desired.

In conclusion, he moved a vote of thanks to the President, which was seconded by Mr. Howard Young and carried by acclamation. The President, in acknowledging the vote, expressed his warm approval of Dr. Smith's idea. The meeting then terminated.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE forty-fifth annual meeting of this Association was held in St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, on Saturday, October 28. Dr. John Barlow, F.R.C.S., presided over a representative attendance. Reports were read and adopted, and office-bearers appointed for the current year. Two features of importance may be noted from the Committee's report, viz. (1) that the church at Kirkcaldy, through the advocacy of the Association Committee, and of the Conference at Aberdeen convened by the McQuaker Trustees a month ago, have now been granted the promise of £150 per annum for three years from the McQuaker Bequest for the provision of an adequate pulpit supply in that centre.

(2) A change in the constitution and rules of the Association of such special importance as to call for general explanation and remark.

It has for some time been strongly felt by not a few Scottish Unitarians that by the altered theological and religious conditions that have resulted from the recent Church crisis, an opportunity for propagandist work was presented which should be utilised to the utmost. The duty of doing this rested not merely upon the existing churches, but also and chiefly with the S.U.A. as the central and representative organisation. It was thought advisable, therefore, so to alter the constitution as to make the provision for propagandist work more prominent, and to indicate clearly a general method of its prosecution. This alteration was carried into effect at the annual meeting. It is not, however, in any sense, a revolutionary change. The Association has simply reverted to a statement of the purposes of its existence as expressed by its members and supporters at its inception forty-five years ago. Thus, the most important clause in the new constitution is one that clearly defines the aim of the work it is proposed to begin at once. That is, "to seek out those in Scotland who hold the principles of free and rational religion, without having the opportunity of combination, and when a sufficient number of such persons can be found, to encourage them to form a society." The intention is by meetings held in selected towns, or even villages, to induce those who sympathise with free, rational, religious principles, to declare that sympathy by attaching themselves individually to the S.U.A., and to form a local society for the promotion of the principles they hold. The new constitution makes no condition of membership except that of a subscription to the Association's funds, and which may be of any amount, but every group of ten local members who subscribe 2s. 6d. each may appoint a representative on the Committee of the Central Association, and shall thus have a voice in all its affairs. They need not make profession of any form of theology, or be members of any church or sect. In this way all possible hindrance is removed, and every inducement given to those who favour freedom in religion, doing something for its promotion and support. It is expected that gradually, but surely, all sympathisers with our principles throughout Scotland will be reached, interested, and encouraged to serve, as they can, the common cause of religious truth, liberty, and progress. Monetary assistance in these endeavours will be much required, and any subscriptions or donations will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the honorary treasurer, Mr. D. M. Stronach, 186, Bath-street, Glasgow, while any further information or explanation will be cheerfully supplied on application to the honorary secretary, Mr. James G. Davidson, 263, Onslow-drive, Dennistoun, Glasgow.

LOVE'S AUTUMN.

WIFE, sit by me, hold my hand, dear,
Turn your sweet face to the light;
We are growing old and feeble,
But our lamp of love burns bright
As of yore, upon our way,
Cheering, guiding, day by day.

Many years we've spent together,
Never has love's light grown dim;
Trouble, dear, has surely taught us,
We can put our trust in Him,
Who, when death-mists cloud life's sun,
Light will prove, to guide us on.

Why, your tears are falling, dear wife!
Do you fear the parting sore?
One must linger while the other,
Passing through the open door,
Fades from loving gaze, and one
On the threshold mourns alone.

Spring and summer we have lived, dear,
Autumn hours are with us now;
We can trace its mellowing touch
In the wrinkles on our brow.
Winter draweth slowly near;
Courage, sweetheart, cease to fear.

Thinking ever of God's greatness
His eternal, loving heart,
Which will hold us, just the same, dear,
Though His wisdom makes us part;
Waiting here or watching there,
Both will rest within His care.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bolton: Halliwell Road (Appointment).—The Rev. H. E. Haycock, of Chester, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of this church, in connection with Bank Street Chapel.

Chester (Resignation).—The Rev. H. E. Haycock has resigned the pulpit of Matthew Henry's Chapel in order to accept a unanimous invitation to become the minister of Halliwell-road Unitarian Church, Bolton. The resignation has been accepted with regret.

London: Child's Hill.—The evening service at All Souls' Free Church is now held at 6 o'clock instead of 7 o'clock as previously. A "Social Studies Society" has recently been formed, and a conference in connection with it will be held on the first Sunday in each month after evening service—7.15. All are cordially invited to take part.

London: Essex Church.—A course of lantern lectures on "Italian Cities" will commence on Tuesday next, when the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will lecture on 'Florence and the Monks of St. Marks." The time is 8.30, and the admission is free.

London: Stratford.—During the year a Young People's Sewing Class, under the direction of Mrs. Welford and Miss Haylock, had been preparing materials for a sale of work, which took place on Wednesday and Thursday, November 1 and 2, in the school-room. Mrs. Hahnemann Epps opened the proceedings on the Wednesday. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards explained that the purpose of the sale was to raise funds wherewith to renovate the church buildings. The Revs. H. Woods Perris, W. H. Rose, and other friends from the neighbouring churches, were also present. The financial result of the sale, together with special donations, was most satisfactory, more than £50 being raised.

Manchester: Bradford.—On Saturday, October 28th, a recital consisting of Enoch Arden and miscellaneous pieces was given by Mr. Fred. Duxbury. Miss Amy Chadwick also sang three solos, and Mr. Fred. Whittaker's orchestral band played three selections. The attendance, probably owing to municipal election in the ward, was not so numerous as had been expected, but those present were fully appreciative.

Manchester (Lower Mosley-street).—During the past few years an important development has gradually taken place at the Lower Mosley-street Schools. Since the settlement of Rev. A. Cobden Smith, early in 1901, efforts have been made to stimulate a healthy religious life, and to revive the spiritual fervour characteristic of former days. Mr. Cobden Smith organised Sunday evening services for parents and elder scholars. These were started on Sunday, September 15, 1901, and have been regularly continued since that time with encouraging progress. The average attendance for the first year was 87, the second 104, the third 116, and the year just ended 94. The committee of the schools generously supported the endeavours made, and from the commencement provided financial assistance without which progress would have been impossible. Accordingly the Sunday services were advertised every week in the local newspapers. A monthly magazine of sixteen pages was provided during the first year by Mr. Cobden Smith, who secured a sufficient number of advertisements to defray the entire cost, and enabled him to distribute a thousand copies each month gratuitously amongst the parents and scholars. By the help of officers and teachers copies of the magazine reached every home, and greater interest was aroused in all that concerned the Sunday-school and religious services. Well-known ministers of the district readily came forward and rendered valuable assistance in promoting the attachment to public worship of larger numbers of members. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal and Principal Gordon have especially earned the gratitude of all concerned for their kindness in conducting services upon different occasions. Several laymen have also officiated and their hearty co-operation has been warmly welcomed. Eventually it became evident that some kind of organisation was necessary to unite members into definite religious fellowship. A Congregational Society was accordingly formed and a committee elected to develop further activities. But whilst such a society did much good work, its operations were limited. It lacked the powers and also the responsibilities of an executive. Now, however, a scheme has been adopted for the formation of of a properly constituted congregation, and the election of a committee to include representatives from the managers of the schools, the Sunday-school teachers' committee in addition to members duly appointed by the congregation itself. On Sunday week this congregational committee was elected, and what will henceforth be known as the Lower Mosley Street Sunday School Congregation, with Rev. A. Cobden Smith as the appointed minister entered upon its new career.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—The annual conference was held at Church-street Chapel, Preston, on Saturday, November 4, representatives from Bank-street and South Shore (Blackpool); Kendal, Lancaster, Chorley, and Preston attended. In the afternoon a service was held, the Rev. Robert McGee conducting the service, and the Rev. G. Critchley (through the kindness of the B. and F. U. A.) preached the sermon, which was very much appreciated by the friends from the various churches. After tea a public meeting was held, when the various reports were read and adopted. The reappointment as the President of the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, and treasurer, Mr. F. Chaddeston, and as secretary, Mr. E. S. Heywood, were adopted; and addresses by the Revs. C. Travers, R. McGee, S. Thompson (representing the N. and E. L. M.) and G. Critchley brought a fruitful meeting to a close. Mr. D. Mayor responded for the Preston friends to a hearty vote of thanks for their kindness in providing tea, &c.

Park Lane near Wigan (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A., has accepted the pastorate here, in succession to the Rev. J. E. Stead.

Pudsey (Appointment).—The Rev. A. Amey, of Colyton, has accepted an invitation to the Church Lane pulpit.

Swansea.—On Saturday evening, in the lecture hall of the Public Library, under the auspices of the Corporation, Mrs. Tudor Jones delivered a very interesting lecture on "Social Life in Germany." The chair was taken by Councillor J. Moy Evans, and the large hall was crowded, a number of people failing to get admission. Mrs. Jones was most cordially thanked for her lecture, and the Cambria Daily Leader on Tuesday had a leading article calling attention to some interesting points which were brought out in the lecture.

Sychbant: Cardiganshire.—The members of this rural congregation, founded nine years ago, have, at last, secured a site for a chapel they are much in need of, as hitherto they have had to meet in a carpenter's shop. The Sychbant preaching-room is in the centre of a large agricultural district, and there is no other place of worship near. It is estimated that the chapel will cost about £500.

Wolverhampton (Resignation).—The Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A., has resigned the pulpit on his acceptance of the charge at Park Lane, Wigan.

THE soul may be overstrained as truly as the body, and it often is so, in seasons of extraordinary religious excitement.—Channing.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR Correspondence columns this week bear witness to what happens if we open the flood-gates to a discussion on the subject of "Denomination." Not all the letters we have received appear this week, and we must warn our friends, if this correspondence is to continue beyond next week, to be as concise as possible, and, if possible, to say something fresh on the subject.

IN the High Pavement Chapel, at Nottingham, a Musical Recital is to be given next Monday evening by Mr. Georg Ellenberger and his friends, who have recently given similar recitals with great acceptance in Lincoln Cathedral. The programme includes a Mozart String Quartette, a Sonata of Corelli's for violin and organ, and the Adagio from a Schubert String Quintette. Mr. Ellenberger and his friends, who are not connected with the congregation, freely give their services out of pure love for music, and with them will be associated Mr. C. Lymn, organist of the chapel. There will be a collection, the whole of which is to be devoted to the High Pavement Holiday Fund. Similar recitals are announced for December and January. We commend this example to other of our churches, in which noble music might fittingly be heard during the week. It is the intention of the promoters that there shall be no applause, but a reverent silence throughout the recital, in keeping with the spirit of the place of worship.

HER Majesty the Queen has given a donation of £2,000 for the assistance of the unemployed, and several newspaper proprietors and others have hastened to associate their names with that of the royal donor, so that a fund of several thousand pounds is already in existence. This shows the desire to be strong in favour of doing something towards the alleviation of a gigantic national evil. It is, however, impossible to express an opinion at present on the uses to which this fund is to be put. The Queen's gift is said to have come as a complete surprise to the Local Government Board, which is responsible for the working of the Unemployed Workman's Act. It has also the effect of leaving it doubtful whether, with due regard to etiquette, the Lord Mayor can now start a Mansion House Fund as had been intended. The difficulties which arise are an illustration of the dangers of attempting to cope by private benevolence with a national problem which requires the national resources for its solution. And in this case there is no need for reliance on personal gifts, inasmuch as the Act of Elizabeth is still the law of the land, and under that law the Guardians are required to provide work in manufactures and otherwise.

THE Act of last session with its appeal for private benefactions is in effect an attempt to switch us off the line of progress. And grateful as we may be to those who give, we must remember that subscription lists are an uncertain source of revenue, and that this evil of unemployment needs to be combated by unintermittent effort. We hope the money subscribed will be used in a useful manner; and since Parliament has for the moment refused to finance the work, it is obvious that many more subscriptions are needed. But still we fear that the generosity of donors will prove unequal to the task. Indeed, we are inclined to trust less in the immediate gifts than in the action of the Central Unemployed Committee. Of this committee, Mr. Frank Smith, late of the Salvation Army, has been appointed secretary, and Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., is among its members. The aim of the Committee is to stimulate the action of the statutory Distress Committees, and by carefully watching the operation of the Act to persuade the country of the need for fresh and more courageous legislation next session. There is little doubt that the present winter will witness a growing agitation throughout the country which, in the intensity of its enthusiasm, may equal that of the Anti-corn law days. And its motto is the Right to Work and to Wages. Whoever comes into touch with the working classes cannot fail to be struck with the new note of determination to have this matter settled in a manner which shall throw no stigma on the man who is willing to work but unable to find employment.

THE following resolution, passed on Monday last, has been forwarded to the Chief Rabbi in London:—"That the Unitarian Ministers of London, assembled at their meeting in Essex Hall on Monday, November 13, express their abhorrence of the shocking outrages inflicted upon the Jews in Russia mainly on account of their religious beliefs, and their deep sympathy with the sufferers and with the relatives and friends of the martyred dead."

PREACHING last Sunday, in Chapel lane Chapel, Bradford, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, said: "During the last few weeks we read almost daily of the gathering clouds of rebellion and anarchy in Russia. From reports that have reached us, it is evident that from end to end that country is in a most pitiable condition; and it is difficult to foresee what will be the immediate result. The classes and the masses are at deadly enmity with each other. Hitherto the people have been repressed and denied their liberties, and now they retaliate. History repeats itself whenever might ignores the claims of right; and now the tragedy which was enacted a hundred years ago in Paris is being repeated in the chief cities of Russia. I think I can say of us all, as members of this congregation, which has ever held dear the great principle of civil and religious liberty, that we deeply sympathise with the victims of bigotry and intolerance in this great crisis in Russia. Many of those who have asked for their rights as children of God have been most cruelly treated. The greatest sufferers have been members of the Hebrew race—men and women in whose veins flows the same blood that flowed in the veins of Jesus, whom their persecutors profess to follow. There exists no doubt as to the ultimate result. Tyranny will be dethroned, and in Russia, as elsewhere, freedom and all its attendant blessings will come. I feel very strongly to-day that we as a church should express our utter abhorrence of the atrocities which are being perpetrated in Russia, and our sympathy with all sufferers in that country. We would also pray that the time may soon come when civil and religious liberty shall be firmly established throughout the Russian provinces." At the close, all present, and there was a large congregation, stood up to signify their approval of the preacher's sentiments.

THE new Mayor of Yarmouth, Councillor R. Nudd, who is a Congregationalist, attended morning service last Sunday in civic state at the King-street Congregational Church, of which he has been a member for more than fifty years. The lesson was read by his son-in-law, the Rev. H. M. Livens, who happened to be in Yarmouth, and the Rev. E. Cornwall Jones, minister of the church, preached a fearless and eloquent sermon on St. John's vision of the Holy City. They ought, he said, to nourish local patriotism in their own town, and see to it that in its growth material did not outrun moral progress. His opinion as to the indirect share taken by the Corporation in the races was well known, and he spoke out on the subject of betting, and then proceeded as follows:—"What is there more defiling than destruction of the civic spirit and the corruption of local patriotism by bribery? It is scandalous that ill-advised, over-zealous partisans should insult you, and degrade your office by bribery that is as brazen as it is insolent. I beg you to take effective action to lift your vocation above this reproach, and I make this appeal in the name of the outraged conscience of the town, in the name of the high traditions of your honourable office. Let your will be made known on this matter in every crisis of your civic life; take legal action against those who auction your dignity in the streets and sell your self-respect in public-houses. All responsible citizens I beg to work unitedly to cleanse our civic life from a scandal which has ceased to be private and become as notorious as it is shameful."

ONE other passage from the full report of Mr. Cornwall Jones's sermon in Monday's Eastern Daily Press, we add here:—"The ideal city seeks the improvement of its citizens. It is our duty not only to safeguard the weak, but to encourage the good. Gold typifies condensed power, and it is the symbol of the concentrated resources of a community. It is not to be expected as in the infantile imagination that the streets shall be paved with gold, but streets are the arteries of a city, and more than channels of commerce and convenience. Streets are the veins through which the social and intellectual life of the people flows. All the resources of a city, moral, material, and intellectual, should be available to make the way of the people easier. There are towns where it is hard to do good; it ought only to be hard to do evil. There are towns where everything combines against a lad or girl anxious to go straight, and where everything tends to crush the spirit of the poor or weigh down the enterprise of the ambitious. It is our duty to see that our accumulated wealth of intellect, our stored up resources of mind, and heart, and judgment, should be used to make the way of the people easier. We should have club-rooms with a healthy social atmosphere, free from the seductions of evil, and the evil seductions of drink. Let us not grudge money spent on the recreation or education of citizens."

MONTHLY week-evening lectures have been given for several winters past at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, E.C., and have been the occasion of many pleasant visits of distinguished lecturers from Holland. The lectures are given on Tuesday evenings, at 6 o'clock; and, as a rule, the lecturer preaches in the church on the previous Sunday morning. The first lecture of the present season was given on Tuesday by Mr. J. Bruinwold Riedel, who retired from the ministry to devote himself to social service as secretary of a well-known society in Amsterdam, "tot Nut van't Algemeen," which we understand undertakes work of all sorts for the general well-being of the people.

THE subject of Mr. Riedel's lecture was "Religion and Society." These, he said, were two living streams, which must flow together for the great end of life. Progress was through strife, and in the formation of society the individualist and social ideals must co-operate. Every man must live his own life, and religion gave him the true impulse. The duty of self-realisation could only be truly fulfilled through devotion to one's fellow-men. The lecturer went on to describe various forms of social service, and strongly urged the duty of the church to take up such work. Religion failed of its true mission if it did not send people out inspired for such unselfish service. At the close Dr. Baart de la Faille expressed their warm thanks to the lecturer. They had all listened, he was sure, with complete sympathy to his exposition and appeal. There might be differences of opinion as to the actual part the church should play. His own feeling was that it should not as such engage in specific social undertakings, but should rather concentrate its efforts on the work of religious teaching and inspiration, and send out its members to take part in the beneficent efforts of other societies specially devoted to moral and social ends. The next lecture, on December 19, is to be given by Professor L. Knappert, of Leiden, on "The Religious Life of Prince William I. of Orange."

IN the November World's Work and Play there is a short article, which may prove useful to many people, on "How to live well in London on six shillings a week," by one who has done it. He is not a vegetarian, but is content with meat, on an average, once a day, and he does not live alone, but in a family of four, and his wife knows not only how to cook but how to shop. Bread and butter he regards as their staple diet, and they have plenty of fruit—and, of course, no wine or spirits. The thing is worth looking into.

"CANON MOORE EDE," the writer says, "who, some years ago, organised half-penny and penny dinners for the poor of Gateshead, stated in his pamphlet on the subject that a full third of the wages of the average working man was literally thrown away because of the wife's ignorance alike of cookery and the proper choice of food, and her inability to lay out a small weekly wage to the best advantage. The women of the poorer classes buy many things that are, from the food point of view, useless or even injurious; they reject as waste much that might, if they knew how to prepare it, be made into nourishing dishes, and by purchasing only from hand to mouth or from day to day the smallest quantities to be obtained, they pay more dearly for their food than they would if they could carefully plan out their requirements and buy a week's or a fortnight's supply at a time. Some twelve years' experience of life in London suburbs convinces me that there is in middle-class households also much waste of good food, and thriftless, uneconomical providing, similar to that which Canon Moore Ede found among the workers of Tyneside." Moral: Read this article, and note especially its wholesome and varied menu for the week.

THE Rev. B. Kirkman Gray has just published a "History of English Philanthropy from the Dissolution of the Monasteries to the taking of the First Census" (P. S. King & Son, 7s. 6d. net), a subject part of which he recently treated also in a course of five lectures at the London School of Economics and Political Science, on "The Philanthropy of the Eighteenth Century: Its Importance in Relation to Modern Problems." Mr. Gray has this week gone to Jena, and proposes to spend three months in Germany for the study of methods of social betterment. From Jena he will go to Leipsic and Berlin, and probably after Christmas to Nürenberg and other cities, returning home in February.

THE Secretary of the Workers' Aid Society reminds the members that their contributions are due at the end of the current month or early in December, and that the distress in the poorer districts in London is likely this year to be very severe.—Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth.

A COLLECTION of lantern-slide pictures made by the late Rev. Peter Dean to illustrate various lectures is now at Essex Hall. They comprise portraits of famous men, copies of Millais' pictures, scenes of the Channel Islands, of England, Italy, &c. These slides may be seen and purchased at the book-room of the Sunday School Association. Mrs. Dean has fixed the price of 3d. per slide, and the S.S.A. Committee are desirous to render what aid they can to dispose of the views for the benefit of the widow.

FOR the benefit of the Blackfriars Mission a performance of Mr. Ambient's play, "A Snug Little Kingdom," is to be given in St. George's Hall on Wednesday evening, December 13, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Lawford, Chairman of the Laymen's Club. Tickets, 5s., 2s. 6d., and 1s., may be had from a number of supporters of the Mission, and at Essex Hall. Let friends take pains to get this bit of wholesome pleasure for themselves (and for a good many others, if they will), and they are not likely to regret it.

HERE is the point to strengthen and fortify. The proffer of dishonest gain, of guilty pleasure, will be resisted by the pure and holy, and the conquest will add new strength and power to the assailed mind. It depends, therefore, upon our own character whether the events and trials of life prove to us sources of blessings or of degradation and condemnation.—George Brown.

STUDIES IN STOICISM.

III.

STOIC PESSIMISM AND OPTIMISM.

I HAVE dwelt in the two preceding articles mainly on the similarities presented by Stoicism and Christianity. I would begin this article by emphasising a difference. To the Stoic the problem of supreme interest was the problem of suffering. To this he returns again and again. His endeavour is always to show how pain and misfortune have a true setting in a rational and good world-order. To the Christian, on the other hand, the problem of supreme interest is, and always has been, the problem of sin. Sin is the breach of moral law, and moral law was conceived of by the Christian as an expression of the personal will of God. To sin was, therefore, to act in opposition to God's will. On this point Dr. Hatch writes: "The idea that the moral laws are laws of God is, no doubt, found in the Stoics; but they are so in another than either the Jewish or the Christian sense; they are laws of God, not as being expressions of His personal will, but as being laws of nature, part of the whole constitution of the world." Sin to the Christian was "something for which God must be appeased, and, on the other hand, something which He could forgive. To the Stoics it was shortcoming, failure, loss; the chief sufferer was the man himself; amendment was possible for the future, but there was no forgiveness for the past."

This distinction, though drawn, as I think, with lines somewhat too hard and fast by Dr. Hatch, was very real, and gave a certain difference of colour and tone to the teaching of Stoicism and Christianity. The thing that chiefly impressed the Christian, when he looked abroad over the world, was the extent of the disobedience to God that existed, the lawlessness and sinfulness of mankind. His prime concern was the diminution of this. He entered upon a glorious warfare for God in opposing it, and he spent his strength in the wrestle with the world, the flesh, and the devil.

His theory of sin was largely derived from Jewish antecedents, but the sense of sin has its explanation mainly in that immediate experience of personal relationship to God which characterised the Christian. It sprang, that is to say, from those mystical elements in Christianity which in Stoicism are so scattered and comparatively so powerless. Of this sense of sin the Stoic had little. Moral wrong was discord and loss, but that intense feeling of the violation of God's majesty and sanctity, the feeling of a wrong against God, so dominant in the Christian, was almost lacking in the Stoic. Consequently, the optimism and the pessimism, the despair and the triumph of the Christian along this whole line were but weakly portrayed in the Stoic's sentiments. The Christian felt himself to be a warrior with a commission from on high. His objective was the serried ranks of the world's evil, His cause was the cause of God's Kingdom on earth. To this all his aspirations flowed, and he believed in its triumph because he believed in God.

When the Stoic, on the other hand, looked abroad over the world, what most impressed him was the fact that men suffered. Pain and hardship were so often the lot of man. He was a weak, defenceless being in the great world-order, assailed on all sides by forces beyond his control, and ending his brief existence at last in mystery and tragedy. His supreme endeavour was to pierce behind all this to underlying good. His great faith reiterated in many varying fashions was that good and good only was the basis of all, and he sought to show how the individual, by schooling his mind and acting rightly, could so come in touch with that basal good, that he would stand serene and undismayed amidst the worst that life could bring.

Now this variation of Christian and Stoic emphasis, the one being on sin, the other on suffering, accounts for the exultant optimism of the one and the mingled pessimism and optimism of the other. Wherever the problem of suffering assumes the position of prime interest, there must always be wide fluctuations of spiritual temper, according with fluctuations in insight, and in the intensity with which facts appeal to the imagination. So in the Stoics we always find such fluctuations, though they end always in a repose on good as somehow at work behind all human misfortune and limitation. "What is man?" asks Seneca. "A potter's vessel to be broken by the slightest shake or toss. . . . . What is man? A weakly and frail body, naked, without any natural protection, dependent on the help of others, and exposed to all the scorn of Fortune." Consider, too, the deep pessimism of the mood into which the philosopher had fallen when he could make such a statement as the following:—"Not to be born is the happiest lot of all, and the nearest thing to this I imagine is that we should soon finish our strife here and be restored again to our former rest." And yet this is the same man who writes: "A good man can never be miserable nor a wicked man happy." And again: "God deals by us as a good father does by his children; he tries us and hardens us and fits us for himself."

One finds the same fluctuations in Marcus Aurelius, and in a less striking manner in Epictetus. Marcus Aurelius continually warns us how ephemeral all human lives and things are, how even the memory of those who have lived wanes and at last dies. Thus he impresses us with our own insignificance, and seeks to draw philosophic calmness and equanimity out of our sense of helplessness and despair.

"Think continually how many physicians are dead after often contracting their eyebrows over the sick; and how many astrologers after predicting with great pretensions the deaths of others; and how many philosophers after endless discourses on death or immortality; and how many heroes after killing thousands; and how many tyrants who have used their power over men's lives with terrible insolence as if they were immortal; and how many cities are entirely dead, so to speak—Helice and Pompeii and Herculaneum and others innumerable. Add to the reckoning all whom thou hast known, one after another. One man, after burying another, has been laid out dead, and another buries him; and all this in a short time. To conclude, always observe how ephemeral and worthless human things are, and what was yesterday a little mucous, to-morrow will be a mummy or ashes. Pass, then, through this little space of time conformably to nature and end thy journey in content." These are strange reflections out of which to win contentment. But Marcus Aurelius was not always in this mood. On other occasions he sounds a more cheerful note: "All that is from the gods is full of Providence. . . . . The gods will not involve thee in evil. They have put all the means in a man's power to enable him not to fall into real evils. . . . Consider that everything that happens happens justly; and if thou observe carefully thou wilt find it to be so. . . . . Everything harmonises with me which harmonises with thee, O Nature."

But though Stoicism on the whole is optimistic, its deep vein of pessimism bore fruit, and this was the doctrine of suicide. As time went on it tended to outgrow this, but it was keenly advocated by the philosophers of Rome in the early centuries of our era. In spite of his insistance that the good man was necessarily happy, the Stoic still taught that life might be so miserable that it behoved any man who was not a coward to quit it. Seneca goes to even greater lengths, and declares in more than one passage that it is only the ability to commit suicide that redeems life from being a curse. "To death alone it is due that life is not a punishment, that, erect beneath the frowns of fortune, I can preserve my mind unshaken and master of itself. . . ." And again: "For this reason, but for this alone, life is not an evil—that no one is obliged to live."

This wide range of spiritual fluctuation is something from which Christianity was exempt. Its exemption is due to the fact that the Christian's interest centred mainly on the problem of sin, and the problem of suffering in his mind occupied a quite secondary place. He was saved from brooding over it and from speculating too continually about it. There seems to be no à priori reason why a concern respecting the sin of the world should not produce a temper of mind in which the deep contrasts of pessimism and optimism should be blended in a similar way. But, as a matter of fact, it rarely does. And in the case of the Christian it did not for two reasons. First, he believed, however incoherently yet very surely, that in his gospel the great expedient of sin had been found. The way of salvation was open. And, secondly, he entered actively into the struggle with sin, and sought to bring salvation to mankind. This belief, joined with this activity, saved him from despair and gloom. His mental attitude was one of exultation, of triumph, and of cheer. The effect of Christianity in passing over the realm in which Stoic thought prevailed was to shift the mental emphasis from suffering to sin, to quicken the sense of sin, and to rouse dormant energies for its overthrow. It banished pessimism by inducing action.

Suffering still existed. The Christian, though generally carried above and beyond its power, did not ignore it. In my first article I dwelt on the Christian attitude towards it. And, in conclusion, I would now point out how nearly one Christian and Stoic were when regarding it from their highest planes.

The Stoic is too frequently conceived of as one who tried to bring his life into harmony with an iron necessity. That he rose to greater heights the following extracts from two of Seneca's epistles show: "In all the difficulties and crosses of my life, this is my consideration: Since it is God's will, I do not only obey, but assent to it; nor do I comply out of necessity, but inclination." And again he quotes a saying attributed to Demetrius with approval: "If I had known the will of Heaven before I was called to it, I would have offered myself."

No one can fail to recognise in this the same mental attitude, the same spiritual condition of faith and self-surrender, that showed itself in the prayer of Christ—"Not my will but Thine be done." That spirit of Christ passed in abundant measure to his followers, and when carried by them to the great seat of Roman power, it did not clash but was identical with the higher aspiration and inclination of Stoicism. That the Christian was more frequently and continuously on those heights we cannot doubt, and his advent quickened the half-awakened impulses that were already leading men to a willing and joyful assent in all things to the all-righteous and all-loving Supreme Will, which is the Will of God.

POST ACER HIEMS.

THE sun gleams golden in his sheaves—
Ah! Daphne not alone took root!
He sets in radiant leaves,
And dawns in flaming fruit.

But now, where late the green was bright
Against the ever deepening blue,
Is shed the grayer light
The leaves are burning through.

From leaf to leaf dread whispers run
That chill the listening trees with fear
Of that snow-wingèd one,
So swiftly drawing near.

Propitiate him, O ye trees,
With banners fluttering as of old—
In some relenting breeze
Wave crimson, purple, gold.

Or where the swirling rain descends,
All lashed to mist by winds in chase,
There spread the cloak that lends
To mire a russet grace.

That over it with gleaming feet,
May Winter not unmindful stray,
And you all gracious greet,
And royally repay.

WE are glad to see that Miss Alice Buckton's Christmas Mystery Play, "Eager Heart," is again to be given in the Hall of Lincoln's Inn. The evenings of December 6 and 8 and the afternoons of December 7 and 9 are the dates announced, and tickets, which range from 2s. to 10s., may be had at the Montague Fordham Gallery, 9, Maddox-street, W., at Chappell & Co.'s, 50, New Bond-street, or from Miss Buckton at 43A, Acacia-road, St. John's Wood. The words of the Mystery are published as a shilling booklet by Methuen & Co.

PROFESSOR HENRY JONES'S MARTINEAU ADDRESS.*

I.

ONE very significant feature in the instructive and most suggestive address read by Professor Henry Jones at the Martineau Centenary celebration at Manchester College, Oxford, is the evidence it presents of the close affinity between Dr. Martineau's fundamental ideas and those held by a very influential school of living philosophers and theologians. This testimony is especially seasonable at this time as a corrective to certain recent statements, such as that made by Professor James Seth in the current number of the Hibbert Journal, that "Dr. Martineau's great treatises on philosophy and ethics made their real appeal to an earlier generation rather than to that which was invited to read them." If this statement really implies, as it seems to imply, that Dr. Martineau's philosophical writings have no vital interest for present-day thinkers and preachers, it certainly has a strange sound as coming from a writer who not more than half a dozen years ago, in his Study of Ethical Principles, quoted from Martineau, with emphatic approval, that distinction between the Self and its Character which is one of the most central and important ideas both in the Types of Ethical Theory, and in the Study of Religion. And further, Professor Seth has now apparently forgotten that a few years before, in his admirable pamphlet on Freedom as Ethical Postulate, he declares that "Hegelianism, equally with naturalism, invalidates the distinction between good and evil, resolving apparent evil into real good, and seeing things sub specie æternitatis as "all very good." The reality of moral distinctions is bound up with the reality of personal freedom; freedom is just the consciousness of moral alternative." When Professor Seth wrote these words, Martineau's masterly defence of the metaphysical reality of this same "alternative" can hardly have failed to make some appeal to his mind.

The fact, however, appears to be that quite recently Professor Seth's mental evolution has encountered a strong reactionary wave of thought, which has carried it in the direction of psychological determinism; for we understand that he now accepts Professor Pringle-Pattison's position, and regards as futile Dr. Martineau's "distinction between the character and the self," and his attribution to this self "of a power to determine itself to either branch of an alternative." As these gifted brothers now appear to agree in accepting the doctrine that the development of no man's moral character could possibly have been in any way different from what it actually has been, it would be most interesting to learn how they now manage to escape the charge, which, as we have seen, Professor James Seth once so forcibly urged upon all deniers of a real moral alternative, the charge, namely, that they are invalidating the distinction between good and evil, by representing virtue and vice as both alike necessary and indispensable, and therefore as being from the Divine point of view "all very good."

There is no difficulty, then, in understanding how it comes about that Professor Seth, who has now, it would seem, gone some way on the road to that absolute idealism which he once so critically examined and so energetically repudiated, should feel that Dr. Martineau's great philosophical treatises no longer appeal to him; but, as Professor Henry Jones's writings clearly show, Professor Seth is entirely mistaken if he imagines that the active thought of the present time, which is expressing itself through the press and the pulpit, is to any great extent in sympathy with the philosophical idealism which is now taught in the Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh.

Professor Jones would, no doubt, rejoice if the present trend of British philosophy were in this direction; but he is well aware that actual facts point just the other way. He clearly sees, and expressly declares, that, whatever may be the future destiny of that idealism in which he has himself such glowing faith, the fact is that at present, whenever Hegelian speculation leaves its snug retreats in the class-rooms of Oxford and of the Scotch Universities, it finds itself confronted on nearly all sides by a wide-spread revolt against what are now regarded as its undue intellectual pretensions. In the graphic words of Professor Jones: "Ethical idealists, personal idealists, pluralists, however little they may agree with each other, or with the older school of Positivists and Agnostics, are now all united in a revolt against what they deem the extravagant claims of the mere intellect."

When Professor Seth expressed the judgment which we have quoted at the beginning of this paper, he can hardly, we think, have sufficiently realised an important fact, which Professor Jones, in his address, has made abundantly clear, viz., that among the philosophical schools which are joining in the revolt against absolute idealism, there is one, and that probably the most important one, which has close and essential affinity with Dr. Martineau's system, and to which, therefore, much of Martineau's philosophical writing still stands in vital relation. In the philosophical theory advocated by such able and influential thinkers as Professor James Ward at Cambridge, and by Dr. Hastings Rashdall at Oxford, the most fundamental of Martineau's ideas are reproduced. These writers accept with Dr. Martineau the metaphysical conception of Causation, and with him, too, they find the origin of the idea of Cause in man's experience of resistance to his volitional effort. What is even more noteworthy, they fully endorse Dr. Martineau's doctrine that every event must have a metaphysical cause, but that the cause need not be one that works uniformly; and that, therefore, a violation of the uniformity of nature, though immensely improbable, is not to be regarded as à priori inconceivable.

It is the distinctive feature of this philosophy as compared with the Hegelian, that it treats all spiritual beings as distinct metaphysical realities, capable of putting forth causal activity; and in discussing the relation of Dr. James Ward's doctrine on this subject to Dr. Martineau's, Professor Jones

* "The Philosophy of Martineau in Relation to the Idealism of the Present Day." By Henry Jones, LL.D., D.Litt., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. Macmillan & Co. 1s. net.

thus emphatically expresses himself:—"It is plain, it seems to me, that Dr. Ward's 'activity' is nothing else than the 'free-will' of Dr. Martineau reduced to its lowest terms, and attenuated to the uttermost. And I have no hesitation in saying that the key to Dr. Ward's new version of Idealism is the same as that which opens for us the successive doors of the whole edifice of Dr. Martineau's system: it is his paramount care for the ethical interests of man, and his belief that real unity, which is verily universal, is, in the last resort, incompatible with real difference, and therefore with morality." (P. 25.) Now this quotation, on the one hand, makes it quite clear that Martineau's system is still a living philosophy, which must be reckoned with in the discussions now proceeding in the higher regions of philosophical and religious thought; and, on the other hand, it lets us see what, in the opinion of Professor Jones, is the weakness in Dr. Martineau's Libertarian Theism, which renders it incapable of explaining that inseparable union of real differences with real unity which, in the view of the Absolute Idealist, constitutes the essential character of all human experience.

(To be concluded.)

"FOR THE FELLOWSHIP."

"A BUNDLE of Free Rhythms" is what we have in the twenty pages of this quaint square booklet,* in plain brown paper cover, and on the back of the title-page, in small type, the author modestly declares himself: "Copyright by H. B. Binns." The bundle is marked "Part I., May, 1905," and we sincerely hope that further parts will come; for, while opinion may differ as to the form of the "free rhythms," it will, we believe, be generally felt that there is true poetry in them. Mr. Binns has just published a large book on Walt Whitman (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), of which we shall soon give a fuller account, and his name is by no means unknown to our readers. Some little time ago, as "Richard Askham," he published "Moods and Outdoor Verses," which was noticed with warm appreciation in these columns.

What he offers us as poet of "The Fellowship" will best be seen from one or two examples. The first piece was prompted by a keen personal sorrow at the death in America of John Wilhelm Rowntree, with whom Mr. Binns was formerly associated at York in the editing of Present-day Papers. The piece is entitled, from its two first words, "April Begins," and from a picture of the lovely springtime the poet passes to speak of his loss:—

Here, on the verge of the city,—
The city that Love
Fain would remodel and change
From the Slayer of Loveliness,—
Into a Body of Life,—
Here on the city's verge,
In the first green of the Wild,
Troubled, and heavy of heart,
And with lingering winter thoughts,
Turning back to the past
That I shared with my friend who is gone—
Troubled, and heavy of heart
And weary of brain,
I wander.

For in a far land,
In a city of strangers,
My friend, so full of manhood,
Is dead.
In a far land,
At the first stirring of spring,
He is dead.

In those lines one hears the cadence of a true elegy, and keener expression of the pain follows; but that is not the end, for a deeper, happier thought prevails:—

Then, suddenly,
Like a light upon the ground,
And like a song out of the air,
Like the clasp of his hand
And the calling of his voice,
Came to me the thought of the Fellowship.

'Twas the thrill of the Spring within my frozen heart,
Transmuting the burden of the Winter silence
Into the burden of the Summer's Song.
Therewithal, with many more, he stood beside me;
For space and thought and death may separate,
But vainly do they part
The singers of that Song.
Across the abysses of the night
The stars for ever sing it,
Merging into music
All the dissonant years.

At its murmur of awakening,
The winter dies: by its chords
The worlds are made anew:
For age-long tasks it is,
And for impossible dreams:
'Tis for remaking cities,
'Tis for remoulding men:
While, in its mighty chorus,
The voices of the living
Mingle with choirs forgotten
And waken notes unsung.

With a great gladness the singer feels that his friend is with him in that Fellowship of which he was and is the inspiration.

Who shall sunder us that sing
Bringing in the Summer?
Who dissever us
That build the City of Souls?
It is a dawn
For the faith that it encloses;
It is a star
For the fire at its heart.

And thou that art ever
Of the fire and the dawn—
Brother in the West!—
Over tides and seasons,
Over thoughts and spaces,
Still dost thou compel us;
Kindling in our hearts
The Summer that shall be,
Quickening in our hearts
The triumphant Love!

In THE INQUIRER of September 16, we published a note on the Friends' Summer School at Street, near Glastonbury, and, as commentary on this song of Fellowship, may recall the following sentences: "This faith in the future was very prominent, and it linked itself to the memory of John Wilhelm Rowntree, whose leadership seems to become even clearer and bolder now that he himself in the flesh is no more. His message of Fellowship as the basis of life was constantly heard."

Of the other pieces in this Bundle (there are only six in all) we commend especially to the attention of our readers that on "May Meetings." We are tempted to quote more, but must refrain. There is a true touch in these rhythms, and a spirit making for freedom and ideal fellowship, wider than the divisions of sect and party, and progress in all that is best in life, which, if we mistake not, will awaken a response in many hearts.

CHORAL SOCIETY CONCERT.

THE London Unitarian Choral Society gave a concert at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, which, from the musical point of view, was an eminent success, and it was a great pity there was not a larger audience. At the same time the performers must have thoroughly enjoyed themselves for the music's sake, and they certainly gave a great deal of pleasure to those who were present.

The Choral Society has over fifty members, and they mustered well for the concert, and sang with the heartiest goodwill. Their president, Mr. John Harrison, accompanied on the piano, to which, for the choruses, was added a small string orchestra, and Dr. H. Walmsley Little conducted.

The programme was in two parts, the first chiefly from Handel and Mendelssohn, the second, more miscellaneous and of a lighter character. In the first part the members gave the chorus "O Father, whose almighty power," from "Judas Maccabæus," and "Then round about the starry throne," from "Samson," and Mendelssohn's cantata, "O come, let us sing," from the 95th Psalm. Mr. Herbert Kinze played a violin solo, and Mr. C. E. Banks sang "It is enough," from "Elijah." These gentlemen appeared again in the second part, as did Miss Agnes Oakeshott, Mr. Charles Spray, and Mr. J. Glen Slade as soloists, and Mr. Aldebert Allen gave two flute solos. The members gave Gade's cantata, "Spring's Message," and two part songs. It was an admirable programme admirably rendered, concluding with "God Save the King."

This is the first concert the Choral Society has given. Members have met fortnightly for practice at Essex Hall, and no doubt, after a rest from this effort, work will be once more renewed.

The Society should receive the heartiest support from our churches. It is doubtless very difficult for members from all parts of London to meet together regularly for such a common purpose, but it is worth considerable effort, for it must strengthen the sense of common life and aim in our fellowship, and, with the inspiration of Mr. John Harrison's presidency, it cannot fail to render very real service in raising the ideal and improving the quality of the music in our churches. Such a society, with the power of giving such concerts as that on Wednesday evening, might do an admirable work by taking their music to the missions and to other quarters where such brightening and uplifting influences are sorely needed. May the Choral prosper, and its efforts be appreciated as they deserve!

THE NEEDLE'S EYE.

"It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix. 24).

Those who heard these words from the lips of Christ were astonished, and appeared to regard them as signifying an impossibility. The words, as remarked in Calmet's Dictionary, have given rise to much discussion, and some writers have interpreted "camel" as cable. But the same proverb is found in the Koran: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut, nor shall he enter there till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." The Jews themselves would say to a man who spoke incredible things: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pombeditha [a Jewish school at Babylon] who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle."

The reply of Christ declares that the thing is not impossible, but only very difficult. What, then, is the needle's eye? A Sunday scholar, having in mind the needles and bodkins used by his mother or sister, asks what is meant. It has occurred before now that the difficulty was explained to consist in the camel's hump. The lad, still thinking of the steel bodkin, is not satisfied; and, even if he knew Greek, he would see that raphis is from "rapto," to sew. Still, "the needle's eye" may be a metaphor, and he is content if he is told that it means a narrow doorway.

This explanation was suggested by Lord Nugent in his "Lands Classic and Sacred." Speaking of entering Hebron with his two Jewish guides, he says: "We were proceeding through a double gateway, such as is seen in so many of the old Eastern cities, even in some of the modern—one wide arched road, and another narrow one by the side, through the latter of which persons on foot generally pass, to avoid the chance of being jostled or crushed by the beasts of burthen coming through the main gateway. We met a caravan of loaded camels thronging this passage. The drivers cried out to my two companions and myself, desiring us to be take ourselves for safety to the gate with the smaller arch, calling it 'Es summ el Kayút'—the hole or eye of the needle. If—as on inquiry since I am inclined to believe—this name is applied not to this gate in Hebron only, but generally in cities where there is a footway entrance by the side of the larger one, it may perhaps give an easy and simple solution of what in the text Mark x. 25 has appeared to some to be a strained and difficult metaphor; whereas that of the entrance gate, low and narrow, through which the sumpter camel cannot be made to pass, unless with great difficulty, and stripped of all the encumbrance of his load, his trappings and his merchandise, may seem to illustrate more clearly the foregoing verse—'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God.' It also applies itself to several other passages by which our Saviour illustrates a similar subject—'Enter ye in at the strait gate,' &c. (Matt. vii. 13, 14), and others."

The difficulty which the camel would experience would not be in his hump, which is hardly higher than his head, but in the bales of goods at his sides. Even when denuded of these, his own sides might be painfully grazed as he was dragged through the narrow doorway. As, then, the two gate-posts make the narrow space, it may come to pass that any two posts in close approximation may be said to form a needle's eye. Without the arch they are like two needles themselves; and so any post, pillar, or monolith may be a "needle." We have Cleopatra's Needle now on the Thames Embankment; and we had already, independently, named as Needles the spiky chalk rocks of the Isle of Wight.

A correspondent of THE INQUIRER, August 20, 1904, mentions that the Rev. Wm. Hincks, when minister of Stamford-street Chapel, on reading the chapter where the saying occurs ("It is easier for a camel," &c.), said that there are or were two rocks in Palestine so close together that a camel had difficulty in getting through, and hence the passage was called the eye of a needle. When I was in Jerusalem, in 1887, and visited the Dome-of-the-Rock Mosque, which stands on the site of the ancient Temple, I saw many things to which curious traditions attach. Among them, under the dome, I observed the two columns, only seven or eight inches apart, now yoked together with iron-work. The iron bracing has been put there, it is said, to prevent persons attempting to squeeze through. People who did pass between the columns were safe for Paradise; but some personage of importance failed to get through, and wished to stifle the tradition. At Old Cairo, again, in the open court of the Mosque of Amer, two columns about eight or nine inches apart have the interspace filled up with brick and plaster for the like reason. Murray's Handbook gives an engraving of the mosque, and indicates the place of "The Two Test Columns." Tradition declares that no one but a true believer in the Koran and the Prophet could succeed in passing between them. The guide-book says: "When all but Moslems were excluded from the mosques, the truth of this was of course never called in question; and now that the profane are admitted, the desecration of the building is readily believed to cause the failure of the charm." The account which I heard on the spot was that the Khedive was a stout man, and could not get through, and that he ordered the filling-up in order to avoid invidious reference.

Cairo and Jerusalem may not seem to be far apart, especially if we think of them as both being, or having lately been, under one rule. But the metaphor and its foundation facts seem to be more widely diffused. To claim a relationship with Scylla and Charybdis, or the Pillars of Hercules, or the Symplegades of Greek story, may seem to be dragging in things that bear no resemblance; yet it can be shown that the likeness is there, and the reference is true and legitimate. Two pillars stand for a gate, and the pairs of pillars or rocks just quoted had originally a symbolic meaning in Greek teaching. The gate they represented was a Gate of the Sun, a recognised expression for one of the equinoxes. At the autumn gate the sun went down to the southern hemisphere, to illuminate Hades; at the gate of spring he ascended into the upper sky. The vernal equinoctial point was the Gate of Heaven. Thus, to pass through the needle's eye may be to be born again and enter Paradise. These considerations give appropriateness to the position of the two pillars Jachin and Boaz at the entrance to Solomon's Temple.

A Dolmen is not the same thing as a Needle, because it is properly a large stone resting more or less horizontally on two or more upright stones; but dolmens vary in appearance, and there is one at least which may illustrate our present subject. It stands on an elevation called Craigmaddie, in Stirlingshire, and is known as the Auld Wives' Lift. The two uprights are close together, and the table-stone rests upon them in such a manner as to leave a triangular opening or eye. There is a popular belief that persons who thrust themselves through this narrow aperture will escape the calamity of dying childless. The stones are figured in Chambers' Miscellany, No. 125, "Monuments of Unrecorded Ages." The writer says: "A belief in the virtue of passing through similar crevices, or through holes bored in stones, is one of the most prevalent of superstitions; it is common in India now as it once was in Western Europe. As recently as 1826, on one day, upwards of eleven hundred people, both men and women, having removed the greater part of their clothes and laid themselves flat on their faces, struggled through beneath St. Declan's Rock, in the county of Waterford, Ireland." Some years ago, when visiting the city of Ripon, I looked round the cathedral and went down into the crypt. This now subterranean structure appears to have been part of a Saxon church, and includes a larger and a smaller chamber. In a stone slab of the dividing wall is an aperture, more or less circular, which is an object of some superstitious regard. The Verger stated that holiday makers, from neighbouring places, come in large numbers to see it, and many young women insist on being put through it. When I returned to the Deanery, where I was a guest, I told Dr. Fremantle (the Dr. Fremantle of those days) what I had seen and heard, and he remarked, laughing, "Yes, they think that if they pass through it all right they will get good husbands." I believe the Verger said that those who cannot get through are not believed to be honest.

There is a mountain in Ceylon called Adam's Peak. In the neighbourhood of Mecca is shown a hill which served as Eve's pillow. The caravans of pilgrims arriving from Cairo, Damascus, and Bagdad, having offered their prayers, ascend this hill, to enter the small niche-like mosque on the summit. To gain credit as a good haji it is necessary, both in going and returning, to pass between two round pillars which have been erected on two hillocks representing the two knees of Eve. As the hillocks are two musket-shots apart, this tradition is either extravagance or allegory. The whole class of traditions seem to me to be explicable as based on the fact that the two posts of a gate symbolised the spring equinox, as the Gate of the Sun, the Gate of Heaven. The sun, and the soul, having passed through death, were born again, and entered Paradise.

OBITUARY.

MR. DAVID GRAY.

BY the death of Mr. David Gray, St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, has lost one who had, through all the years of his life, been an unostentatious exponent of the kindly humanity and cheerful confidence of our liberal faith. He was a child of our Church. He grew with its growth, and advanced with its progress, not in any parade of intellectual appreciation of its theoretical teachings, but by a quiet, hearty, and sincere demonstration of the gentle humanity which those teachings are meant to inspire. His interest in and zeal for the cause of free, rational religion were always hopeful and helpful, and he could always be depended upon for counsel and assistance in every undertaking that made for the promotion of cordial human fellowship and peace. He lived his faith, and commended it to others, first of all in his home, and more there than elsewhere. In all relations that faith was for life rather than death. He was a man whose heart was right. That was his highest honour, and there can be none higher. In genial, kindly earnestness of purpose, as husband, father, and friend, he exemplified the faith of reason which is the faith of love, never doubting or despairing of goodness, never swerving from the course his best ideals and affections dictated and allowed:

It was thus that he plodded ahead,
Never turning aside.
So we'll think of the life that he led,
Never mind how he died.

J. F.

MRS. KELLY, OF DUNMURRY.

It was a grievous loss which befell the Rev. J. A. Kelly on Friday, November 3, in the death of his wife, a loss shared by his congregation at Dunmurry and a wide circle of friends. The funeral service was conducted on Sunday week by the Rev. Principal Gordon, of Manchester, and last Sunday the Rev. G. J. Slipper, of the Belfast Domestic Mission, preached a memorial sermon. In the course of it he said:—

"Our lives are poorer through the loss of the companionship and fellowship of a true friend, whose righteousness exalted her life, whose sincerity of heart enriched her friendship, and whose gentleness and simplicity of life won for her the love and regard of all who were privileged to know her and feel the influence of her genial spirit. The Psalmist, out of the rich experience of his trustful heart, tells us that the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance; and well might we echo that truth as we think of all that ennobled the life of a faithful servant of God, whose singleness of heart and sincerity of purpose was kindled by a love for the highest things; whose soul was above any meanness, and who set an example worthy of emulation.

"So unostentatious and unconventional, we got quite near to her heart and felt the value of her friendship. No trouble was counted too much for her to undertake, if it meant comfort to someone who needed her help; nor was any service too trivial for her to render.

"What sweet memories are awakened within our minds as we think of that life, so good, so true, so gentle. It was a life that manifested the quiet working of the Christ spirit in patience and goodness. The love she bore was no mere sentimental ecstasy, but deeply rooted and bountifully bestowed."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN a tiny wooden cottage just outside a wood lived, some years ago, a man and his wife and his family. The man was a labourer, and worked for our family as outdoor man, looking after the garden of our little Scotch home, and having the charge of the horse, the cow, and the pig, and all the outhouses. He was a good man and a good worker. His children were four boys and two girls, who were good children, and all attended the village school. Sometimes, in holidays, the elder boys used to help to make our hay, or to gather fruit in the garden; and their mother told us that the children used to plan how when their father got past work Jem and Hugh would take his place and work for Dr. Martineau, and Tina should be Miss Martineau's housemaid. But this did not happen, as their father was quite able to work long after the children had grown big and got other things to do.

Jem was a quiet steady boy, and a good scholar; and Hugh was a little curly-headed fellow in a kilt, with bright blue eyes like his father; and he was something of what his father called "a rascal."

When Jem had passed all through the village school, his father and he were so anxious for him to learn more, that though they were quite poor people, who lived in a tiny little cottage, where Jem and Hugh had only a little sort of cupboard to sleep in, his father managed to send him to a village about fifteen miles off, where there was a very good school, with classes for more advanced pupils. But as it was too far for Jem to go to and fro every day, he lived in a little lodging near the school from Monday to Friday, and only came home for the week ends. Jem has now for many years been a clerk in a bank, and he is married.

Little curly-headed Hugh was less of a scholar than Jem, but he grew into a tall young man, and became a tailor. He was getting on well, and got employment among the country people, and was living at home in the little cottage by the wood. One day when he had finished a job of work he went to take it home to someone who lived at the other side of the river Spey; and as it was a long way round by the bridge, he did as the young men often did, and waded through the river. But he never came back. An anxious search was made, and after some time his sister Tina found him in the river amongst the bushes at its side, drowned. That was the first break in the family. His resting-place is in the wild grassy churchyard not far from the river which drowned him.

The next to Hugh is Tina, who, when she grew old enough, went into service; and so, after many years, did little Grace, the youngest.

There were two more boys between Tina and Grace, John and Sandy; and Sandy, when he grew big enough, was employed in a shop in a little village near—where he is still.

It is of John that I now want to tell you. His parents removed to a village some miles off (the same where Jem went to the good school), and after that we did not often see them. But one day his mother came over to see us, and we asked her about all the young people. When it came to John, and I asked her what he was doing, she said "Oh, he's in school still." "In school?" I said. "Why, how old is he?" "He is twenty-four," she said. He had gone to work in the summer, for several years, to earn what he could, and all the winters he went back to the same village school where Jem had gone, and where the master could teach them many advanced studies. He was very studious and very industrious, and he worked on in this way with immense patience and perseverance. A kind minister helped him with advice and encouragement, and this summer we heard that John had been studying at one of the Scottish universities, and that he had now been successful in his examination, and had got his degree.

Some of your big brothers or your father will be able to understand how much that means of industry, patience, and intelligence in a poor labourer's son, with nothing but his own efforts to help him. During the summer he was helping a minister in his work in one of the little Western Scotch islands, till the university opened again for the winter. Now he has gone back to college to go on with his studies to be trained as a minister.

John's father had the greatest respect for my father, Dr. Martineau, when he worked for him, and we sent to him the two numbers of THE INQUIRER containing the report of the celebration of Dr. Martineau's 100th birthday, which he read with the greatest interest, and he then sent them to John; and in returning them, with his own hearty thanks, John said, "Dr. Martineau was a man for whom I always had a great veneration, and that veneration has deepened as I have dipped a little into his writings." And he adds, "I cannot close this letter without acknowledging how deep a debt I owe to your family. In my childhood days books were a luxury, and I can remember how eagerly we looked forward to the arrival of the volume of "Little Folks," which came as regularly as the New Year itself. From that volume I developed a taste for reading—a taste which I was enabled to gratify through the library which you were the means of starting at Inverdruie."

I am sure so earnest a lad will make a good and useful minister.

You see, John had (and has) an ideal before him at which to aim, and towards which he has worked on steadily and patiently through many difficulties and self-denials. Something higher than anything that we have gained is what we should all fix our eyes upon, and not rest till it is won; and if it ever is won, we shall then find another ideal, still a-head; and so on for ever and for ever.

CAMBRIDGE THEOLOGIANS ON MIRACLES.

THE new volume of Cambridge Theological Essays* is an interesting companion to "Contentio Veritatis," the volume of "Essays in Constructive Theology," by six Oxford Tutors, published three years ago. The Cambridge Theologians hold more closely to the old paths, and are not so deeply impressed as the Oxford Tutors with the need of new and constructive thought on the great questions of religious history and theology. Theirs is the more substantial volume; nearly six hundred pages to the Oxford three, and fourteen essays instead of seven. We are proportionately grateful to the Oxford men, and yet accept with sincere respect and keen interest the more rigorous claim upon our attention of the later essayists.

Our immediate purpose, however, is not to review the volume as a whole, but to note its attitude on one particular point,—a point, indeed, of crucial importance, from which the character of the volume as a whole, and the nature of its apologetic may be safely inferred.

The eighth essay, by Dr. MURRAY, late Dean of Emmanuel College and Warden of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, is on "The Spiritual and Historical Evidence for Miracles," and the same subject is also dealt with at considerable length in the tenth essay, on "The Gospels in the Light of Historical Criticism," by Dr. CHASE, the Bishop-Elect of Ely. The general conclusion of both essayists is that while there are undoubted difficulties in the records, the main facts of the Gospel miracles, as commonly received in what are regarded as orthodox circles, and in particular the supreme miracle of the Resurrection (with the empty tomb and bodily re-appearance before the Ascension)—to which Dr. CHASE adds the miracle of the Virgin Birth—are not to be impugned by modern criticism. These, in the essayists' view, are essential facts of the Christian faith, which must be accepted by those who would have true insight into the meaning and purpose of the Gospel.

We cannot say that we have found Dr. MURRAY'S defence of miracles particularly cogent or persuasive. We have tried to put ourselves in the position of those who want to believe, for Dr. MURRAY urges that no one in these days can understand or accept the miracles as Divine who does not first recognise the spiritual purpose they represent. "We accept a miracle to-day," he says, "on the strength of the revelation that it brings, rather than the revelation on the strength of the miracle." But when we examine his definition of a miracle we find no assured conviction pressing through.

HUXLEY'S criticism of HUME on the subject of miracle is quoted with approval, and Dr. MURRAY accepts the position that, regarded from the point of view of modern science, even the most marvellous event, if the evidence shows that it really did happen, must take its place within the unchanging order of natural law. It is not a breach of that law, as was formerly supposed; with deeper insight we should see that it is according to law, though perhaps a higher law which has yet to be fully understood. But what is this but to say that if a "miracle," an "extremely wonderful thing," really happens, it is, after all, no miracle at all?

Dr. MURRAY'S next contention is that from the theologian's point of view miracle is something that suggests the immediate action of GOD as distinguished from the regular action of physical forces "which we naturally conceive as mechanical." Yet he quotes WORDSWORTH, and admits that deeper insight may reveal to us a divine meaning even in common things. "To the Hebrew Psalmist," he says, "thunder was the voice of GOD. LINNÆUS fell on his knees when he first beheld the glory of the broom. To us both of these are merely natural phenomena. The wonder in them has been worn off by use and wont, even though we may feel that fuller life would enable us to be conscious again of the freshness and the awe of common things." Thus, "miracle," for those who have true understanding of the Divine Immanence, will be merged in the larger thought, and the former special interpretation of any "extremely wonderful event" as a direct interposition of GOD in the field where He is not habitually so active, will cease to have any significance for religion. As we try to interpret the providence of GOD in history, it is no longer a question of which events are to be set down as "miracle," it is, above all, a question of the mystery of personality in the supreme leaders and inspirers of men. Dr. MURRAY, however, still believes in the old distinctions, and, with other essayists in this volume, labours to establish the miraculous character of CHRIST'S birth and resurrection and the marvellous things related of him in the Gospels. He does not face the question raised by the remarkable parallels of miracle in the records of other great religious teachers, and notably in the life of GAUTAMA, the Buddha. His main contention is that, because JESUS was so manifestly a unique personality, in whom the one supreme revelation of GOD to man is given, therefore the "miracles" recorded of him—at least, those quite clearly attested—must have been miracles indeed. And he does not see that in previous admissions he has destroyed the force of this argument; nor is he ready to admit any fresh interpretation of the Gospel narrative in the light of that deeper thought of the Divine Immanence.

For better guidance in this matter we turn again to Oxford. Dr. DRUMMOND, Principal of Manchester College, has written an essay on "The Miraculous in Christianity," published this week by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.* Here we find a much clearer apprehension of the significance of "miracle" in the light of a spiritual faith. We commend especially to the Cambridge Essayists, one of whom refers with warm approval to his book on the Fourth Gospel, Dr. DRUMMOND'S remarks on the subject of the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection.

"That the rejection of the miraculous involves a profound and far-reaching change in our conception of Christianity," says Dr. DRUMMOND, "cannot be denied; but I do not believe that the spiritual sincerity or value of our profession of discipleship to JESUS of Nazareth need suffer any permanent injury." We still have knowledge of his character and teaching, and the appeal which a pure and devoted soul makes to our moral admiration and religious susceptibilities. The Gospels, Dr. DRUMMOND holds, are historical "in their grand features, and especially in the unique spiritual impression which JESUS made upon those who were most intimately acquainted with him." And here we will quote the concluding passages of the Essay:—

"We can also recognise the divine source of CHRIST'S spirit, which is clearly no product of human self-will, and thus, through a human personality, with the unfathomable depth and infinite suggestiveness that belong to personality, we reach the grace and love of GOD, and enter into our true relation with Him; and without this inward apprehension of the divine a miracle would be nothing but an unmeaning fact from an unknown world. But, recognising this, we cannot help feeling that GOD has spoken to us through His Son; and this bounding of the heart towards the divine in CHRIST is a surer witness to us than ten thousand miracles. We feel through him the touch of the divine pity and sympathy, and begin to understand what these things mean. In him we see beyond the delusive shows of life into the eternal power of goodness, and find within us, as a pledge of immortality the earnest of the Spirit. We learn that man has a supernatural source, and is a son of GOD; and this we apprehend, not because someone has said so, and worked a miracle, but because, having been with the Beloved, and folded through reverent sympathy into his inmost heart, we hear the Spirit bearing witness with our own spirit.

"Further, we have all needful outward authority, an authority which quickens, but does not enslave; for, the veil having been at least partially lifted from our own souls, we can entirely believe in the profounder insight of him who has given articulate voice and meaning to our dumb unshaped aspirations, and whose appeal has wakened such a grand response from millions of grateful disciples. Asking no more for intellectual infallibility, we are not disconcerted by the tinge of temporary thought which is apparent in some of his recorded teaching, but we learn to find the Divine Word amid the limitations of the flesh, and to pierce through transient forms to the eternal Spirit. Thus in fellowship with the Father and with him, and in the communion of saints who have borne a faithful witness, we find at once a stimulus to emancipated thought and a peaceful faith in the realities that concern the soul; and the fault is in ourselves if we have not here enough to sustain us in some worthy living and some triumphant hope.

"A new light is slowly dawning over Christendom, and we know not yet what we shall be. We know only that some things which captivated the childish imagination of the world are passing away, and that we are slowly entering on our spiritual manhood. Through much tribulation, through deep searchings and anguish of heart and conscience, we must enter into the kingdom of GOD; only we must never doubt that the fading glories of the past will seem dim and poor beside the glory which is yet to be revealed. Meanwhile, in the great upheaval of thought which alarms so many, may we not rejoice if it is bringing us to this issue, that a sham Christianity will do no longer, and that nothing but the Life of the Son of GOD within the heart can abide through the crisis which is coming on the religious world? In the power of that Life, which is the Light of men, we may step boldly on the dark and troubled waters, believing that GOD will bear us up, and lead us through the dim confusion of the night's changeful forms to the morning of a clear and harmonious faith."

THE course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," which is being given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter on Tuesday evenings in Birmingham, is being attended by an audience of some two hundred. "An Impression," by a visitor who happened to be in Birmingham and heard the first lecture, appears in another column. The first of two lectures at Bridport, Taunton, Ilminster, and Exeter, respectively, on "The Gospels and How to Read Them," have also been attended by good audiences, increased at Taunton by a contingent from Bridgwater and at Ilminster from Crewkerne.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

CONVALESCENT NURSING HOME FOR INVALID CHILDREN, WRAY CRESCENT, TOLLINGTON PARK, LONDON, N.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to speak in your columns once again on behalf of Winifred House, the work of which is familiar to most of your readers; for it is now nearly fifteen years since, as Mrs. Hampson's Memorial Home, it was opened to receive poor children who were suffering from hip or spinal disease; or who needed careful feeding and skilful "mothering," in order to build up their constitution after some form of debility.

We feel that the experience gathered from these years, warrants us in saying that the Home is doing excellent work; but, from its nature, it cannot be cheap work. Now, although its funds have been most generously provided by its many friends, the fact remains that our ordinary outgoings are about £100 more than our ordinary income, and for this deficiency we have to rely on special gifts. Thus far, during this year our donations have been under £30, and this amount would have been still less, had it not been for the valuable help received from two ladies who have worked so valiantly, and with much success, to interest new friends in the Home.

May we ask for further help? Either by donations, or, better still, new subscriptions; to be sent either to W. M. Blyth, Esq., Hon. Treasurer, 20, Highbury-terrace, N., or to me, at my address given below.

Then I want to say that we have now one or two vacancies for children who are weakly, who are on the borderland between health and disease. One can scarcely over-estimate the value of Homes such as ours for such cases. Over and over again we have seen splendid results, maintained in after years, of children who have come to us in a thoroughly debilitated condition, and who have returned home after two, three, or sometimes six months, with health and strength thoroughly re-established.

During this year we have had three such cases from amongst our own Sunday-schools; and, as we grudge even one bed being empty, I wish to invite anyone who is interested in a delicate child, such as needs the kind of care we can give, to write to me, at address below, for an application form; in order that, if the case is suitable, we may take it in.

I should like just to refer to one child who left us six weeks ago, Sarah. Her parents are both blind, and the little daughter had also been blind from birth. But a specialist thought that Sarah's eyesight might be gained, though this would need several operations. Eight times she went under the surgeon's hands, and he still gave good hope of ultimate recovery; but the child's general health had so run down that it was feared that she could not go through with the treatment. It was then that Sarah was sent to us; after a few months she became quite sturdy. Again she went into hospital for the final operation, and returned to Winifred House. Your readers will, I know, understand our joy when we found that sight had actually come; and will realise that it was a happy day when we gave her back to her blind father, whom she was able to lead down the steps, looking so proud and important out of her large round spectacle-glasses!

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

SIR,—In your issue of November 11, Mr. Armytage Bakewell criticises rather violently the report of the Public Questions Committee. He says, in the first place, that it was decided, almost unanimously, merely "to receive." Now the real division of opinion was when the amendment was put, and then the figures were 38 to 29. Then the opponents of the amendment are termed "hot political partisans," as though earnestness of purpose and zeal for righteousness were things to be despised. "Raw political feeling" is also referred to as the sole reason for condemning the introduction of Chinese slavery into Africa. The plea for peace is thrust on one side by Mr. Bakewell because it might hurt poor Lord Roberts's feelings. The references in the report to unemployment, poverty, education, temperance, and kindness to animals are all labelled as of a political character, and the writer of the letter resents the intrusion of such extraneous matters into a conference, usefully designed for mutual fellowship. Now, Sir, I dissent altogether from this view of a religious conference. I think a religious conference should include the consideration of the ways and means by which the religious organisation can promote human well-being, not only in this country, but in the world at large. War, intemperance, slavery, injustice, poverty, and cruelty are such real and dreadful things that it is the duty of all churches to come to the front with remedies for the fearful evils. There are too many armchair politicians nowadays, and too many easy-going members of churches, who are content to let the great world drift on to disaster because they have not the eye to see nor the courage and energy to right human wrongs. They cry "Peace, peace," when there is no peace, and when the world is writhing in an agony of despair they stifle the cry of the suffering. The everyday world is getting sick of the complacent churchgoer and the cant of his creeds, and is anxious to come in closer touch with the spirit of Christianity, which is the spirit of brotherhood and self-sacrifice. A Government may be a great influence for good, or it may be a means of great evil, and for the churches to refrain from criticism of a Government, under the specious plea of "no politics" in religion, is to surrender the fort to the enemy. Religion should permeate the political world, regenerate its constitution, and give it new ideals. To divorce religion from politics is to give place to the devil. Practical religion deals with all the affairs of human life as well as that of a future state. A recent writer says, "Our fathers were content with a heaven after death; we demand a heaven here. They regarded themselves as pilgrims with no continuing city, mere desert land sojourners; we are determined that this country of ours shall be a land of God. Nothing has so alienated the people from the ministrations of the Word as the age-long opposition of the churches to their most elementary rights as human beings. It is to the Reformer we owe our progress, not to the churches. If the churches are to be loved, they must lead. If we cannot make our politics part of our religion, we have no right to cast even a vote." With these words I cordially agree, and trust that the Public Questions Committee will continue year by year to voice noble sentiments, regardless of fear or favour. Unitarians have a noble faith and a glorious heritage, but they must not rest on their past achievements, they must go forward into a land of promise and hope.

"O living church! thine errand speed;
Fulfil thy task sublime!
With bread of life earth's hunger feed;
Redeem the evil time!"

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—I ask the favour of space to review the account of the annual meeting and report of the S.U.A., which appeared last week. Special attention is due to it by reason of the crisis which has come upon the Association and the transformation effected in view of the crisis.

The principal business before the meeting was the consideration of the proposed transformation, but four hours were spent ere it was reached, and by that time I and others had to leave to catch a train for a long journey, and had no say in it. The meeting was very frictional, and the more critical speakers were continuously interrupted.

The report for the year was ominous in its omissions. The time-honoured reports from ministers were a-wanting. The ministers were unreckoned and silenced after ninety-two years of recognition and speech. Moreover, there was no reference made to any congregation except Kilmarnock and Kirkcaldy, and that was controversial. For all that the report itself indicated, the second Glasgow congregation and the one at Aberdeen had become non-existent. That was significant of much.

The report itself was mainly made up of a deliberate, elaborate, and severe indictment against the McQuaker Trustees, in which a bitter animus was abundantly evident. I protested against this as strongly as I could amidst a fire of interruption. In my opinion the report as an indictment is utterly disgraceful.

The "first feature of importance" presented in the account furnished to you is the securing of £150 per annum for three years from the McQuaker Trustees for the Kirkcaldy congregation. That is credited to the advocacy of the Committee of the S.U.A. and the conference at Aberdeen. The credit may be allowed doubtfully, but the reflection on the McQuaker Trustees should be disallowed. The Trustees have all along shown themselves the cordial friends of all the churches in Scotland; and, though there may have been a difference of opinion between them and the committee of the S.U.A. as to how help should be given, they are entitled to respect. That the report does not give, but only recrimination. I have a strong feeling that the real blame is on the other side.

There is an omission from the account furnished to you which is notable. No mention is made of the important fact that the Church building at Kilmarnock was secured for another year to the congregation there in opposition to an unwarranted decision by the committee of the S.U.A. to sell it. Your correspondent in describing the change in the constitution and rules of the Association says "it is not in any sense revolutionary." In my opinion it is. Ever since its foundation in 1813 the Association has been an organisation of worshipping societies or churches. The first rules of the Association expressly declare that its leading object is "to promote and keep up intercourse and correspondence between the different societies in Scotland which are united upon the common principles of the strict unity of God and of His universal love to His creatures." In 1830 the Association was re-established on the same basis, as a federation of churches. In 1861 it was again re-organised, its first object being to preserve and strengthen the Unitarian societies already existing in Scotland. The object is requoted in the reports for 1882, 1887, and 1892.

The constitution was revised in 1892, but still churches were objects in view. The second rule ran thus: "The Association is formed . . . to render aid to churches," &c. All along the line of its history till now the annual manifesto of the Association had its reports from churches and ministers.

This year the shadow of revolution is upon it, and there are no reports from ministers. Churches are extruded as objects of concern, and "groups" appear in their stead. All responsibility to churches is disavowed. "Grants to churches" are not on the programme. That seems to me to be revolutionary the wrong way. It is a recession, not a development. I believe it would be deemed illegal by the higher Courts, for the Association holds possession of funds that belonged to churches.

From the point of view of the Aberdeen church there appears to have been for the past four or five years a determined attempt to suppress congregational activity on the part of the committee of the S.U.A. Our efforts have received no encouragement from them; but, on the contrary, have been deliberately despised. We have many proofs of this to give. We naturally feel aggrieved; and now that we, in common with other churches, are cut off from the Association, we are surprised and pained.

Whether the new scheme of "meetings in selected towns and villages" will succeed or not remains to be seen, but it is necessary meanwhile to protest against the abolition of churches by the new constitution, and the patronage of "groups" by means of money procured by the sale of venerable churches. That seems to me to be a species of vandalism and misappropriation of the worst possible kind. I have cleared myself from having any part in it.

ALEX. WEBSTER.

DENOMINATION.

SIR,—My friend, the Rev. W. Whitaker, opens up in your columns a subject of almost endless discussion, in recommending our denomination to change its name Unitarian for that of "Free Christian." This subject has been discussed amongst us for more than a generation, and has always resulted in a drawn game, and is likely to do so as often as it is raised. Mr. Whitaker appears to think that by this change we shall rid ourselves of many difficulties in the way of our success, and shall reap a much longed-for harvest. Alas for the vanity of human expectations.

"Prophets and kings (among us) desired it long, and died without the sight."

What a Martineau and a Beard, and many another protagonist against this name failed to accomplish, would scarcely be likely to be achieved by a resolution of the B. and F.U.A., or even of the Triennial Conference. In either assembly, in my opinion, a more profitless discussion could scarcely be raised. Such questions are not settled by resolution any more than a nation is made virtuous by Act of Parliament.

Let us briefly look at each of these two names. It is urged against the former that it is misunderstood, that it is shied at, that it does not touch the thoughts of many who are troubled with theological doubts, that it requires a roundabout explanation to make it fit the particular case of many in a transition state; that it does not correctly represent either our affirmations or our negations. This, I think, Mr. Whitaker will acknowledge to be a fair summary of his objections to the Unitarian name, and it seems a somewhat heavy indictment which he brings against it. But does he think that all these difficulties will disappear by a mere change of name? If he does, I am of a different opinion. Moreover, I hold this name to be more definite than that of "Free Christian." It designates a body of worshippers who, though greatly misunderstood, are never in danger of being mistaken for a creed bound sect; or for Mohammedans, Jews, Swedenborgians, or what not. We start from the unity of God, which gives our name, and on which we are all, I imagine, pretty well agreed, but on other matters we diverge in various directions, about which nobody is very much concerned, each one following his own convictions without let or hindrance, whithersoever they may lead. To thoughtful minds this position is not difficult to understand, and they would need very little reflection one would suppose, to grasp our principles of freedom in thought and righteousness in life. To my mind this position is much better defined by the name Unitarian than it would be by that of Free Christian, and I am of opinion the outside thinking public would so regard it; and those who do not think are simply hopeless, for we can make no appeal to them. As for the odium of the name that ought not to trouble us much, for it is the accepted lot of all who go against the stream.

Now for the name "Free Christian." This is suggested as our designation, but it may embrace anything from evangelical orthodoxy to Theistic Unitarianism. It is vague enough in all conscience. Moreover, is not the name already appropriated? The various Nonconformist bodies band themselves together as the Free Churches of our land, while the Unitarian, the freest of them all, is rigidly excluded. If we adopted the name suggested, would not confusion arise in the public mind between Free Churches and Free Christians? Let me give an illustration. Many years ago an offshoot from one of our older congregations in a Lancashire town, started a new movement under the name, "Free Christian Church." It was a movement in the direction of Theism, as was shown by the fact that Mr. Moncure Conway was invited to conduct the services at one of their anniversaries. A regular minister was appointed who had been minister of one of our churches in the West of England. In the course of events this minister was invited to conduct some anniversary services in a Congregational Church in the neighbourhood of Manchester, which he did. But at the next local district meeting of that body this congregation was called to account for inviting a Unitarian minister to preach in their chapel, and the answer given was that being the minister of a Free Christian Church they thought he belonged to some body of Methodists.

This is a sample of the vagueness and confusion this name would introduce, and shows that through this disguise the people still see the Unitarian. We may call ourselves what we will, we are still Unitarian to the world at large.

Another striking example of this was given when the late Charles Beard passed away. He wished to abolish the name and would not take it himself. But to the outside public he was still a Unitarian for all that, and when he died a paragraph appeared in the papers headed, "Death of a Unitarian Orator." Do we need any further evidence that we cannot abolish this name by a resolution?

JOHN FOX.

SIR,—If this question of a name for the heterogeneous collection of people, commonly known to those who do not include themselves, as Unitarians, is really going to be opened again, let us hope that real advance will be made towards a solution.

At present the people in question are in a state of apathy concerning their own condition; or if the endless comments on their own collective condition, not unmixed with regrets, which are daily uttered by almost all of them, seem inconsistent with the most absolute apathy; the fact remains that they neither put their shoulder to the wheel nor cry to heaven for help. They do not flock to the divine service in their churches like men believing in the salvation of the world, and in the power of prayer unto salvation; they do not offer their money cheerfully and liberally for the building of new churches, even in those places that afford some promise; and in general, practical or substantial suggestions for amelioration, progress, or achievement, are being reserved for lack of heart or meeting with neglect when offered. I venture to suggest that this apathy, which ought to be admitted, not of all individuals concerning themselves, but of all of us concerning our community collectively, is due, more than to anything else, to the disagreement in which we stand respecting the question of denomination.

Many of us, left to themselves, would have found no cause for quarrelling with the name Unitarian, thinking that, in their case, its alleged disadvantages were fanciful and not real; and some of these (not all of them) neither deny the assertion that it stamps them as a sect with the implication of exclusiveness and the obstruction to catholicity which are essentially characteristic of all sects alike nor resent the implication. For some of us feel, that so long as other sects are in existence, upholding doctrine which leaves the truth in darkness and confusion on that side upon which, from our standpoint, we can cast a superior light, it is our duty to stand unitedly, and, therefore, as a sect, to do so; whilst they think further, that the ideal fact of perfect catholicity can only follow as the final and natural result, however distant, of the logical contest of the sects. On the other hand, many of us utterly deplore sectarianism, having no faith in it as a principle conducing to correct belief and final harmony; and the divergence of these views is so decided, and they are so tenaciously held, that they practically cause that division among us which is all-sufficient, directly or indirectly, to account for our present lack of strength. That which we lack is strength of unity.

It would be sad indeed if those particular groups of individuals within our present one community, who already are virtually divided, should be obliged to go yet further asunder, and actually depart from one another. There is certainly one way by which this event may be to some extent averted. Presumably, that which even those of us who are most content to be called Unitarians, most rejoice in, is freedom from the bondage of falsely asserted authority on the part of theological exponents; freedom which all of our community have claimed, and which has made possible that private evolution of belief which each of us enjoys. If that is so, those who have been most content with, or most attached to, the Unitarian name, should be willing to accept the substitution of the name most frequently urged of late, and which heads the letter from Rev. W. Whitaker, in your issue of last week. Those of our community who object to the Unitarian name, object to it, more often than not, less on account of its inadequacy or inaccuracy on theological grounds as applied to themselves, than on the general principle of aversion to sectarianism. Their sincere antisectarianism is apt to make them unjust to their comrades, for it often leads them to disparage action on the ground of its being sectarian, when its tendency, being merely that of corporate action, is not necessarily sectarian, though it must, perforce, be denominational. A private individual, who wishes to do good, may remain anonymous; but a corporation or a community desiring to do public good, and of gathering strength from the public which it serves, cannot, or cannot consistently, desire to be without denomination. But if we all agreed to call ourselves "Free Christians," that would relieve our antisectarian members, and for that matter, all our members, of course, from the implication, contained in the theological appellative, that they are committed to a defined theological system, common to all; whilst it would leave us all free to associate as one community, still held together by the true bond of sympathy for all who accepted the principle of entire liberty of reason and conscience for the evolution of religious creeds.

Probably, even this name would be unacceptable, as being too narrow in its implication, for a good many persons at present included in our community; some of whom are indifferent towards the Christian name, while some expressly repudiate it for themselves and others, possibly a larger number, themselves doing homage to Christ, would yet not like to exclude from their fellowship those who are unable to say that Jesus is Lord. By all these, perhaps, the name, "Free Seekers after God" might be preferred. But to some the former name would be too narrow; the latter, to others, too comprehensive.

Your present correspondent is one of those, who, whilst rejoicing in the goodness and the wisdom of all the good and wise, believe, nevertheless, that those of our community who will eventually continue to stand together, however they may be denominated, will be found to be people who consider that they are members of the one body of which Christ is head.

EUSTACE THOMPSON.

November 13.

SIR,—From Mr. Whitaker's letter I fear we are in for another profitless and wearisome discussion on the question of labels. May I ask:—

(1) What is a "Unitarian"? Is it not one who believes in one God in one person? And do not all our churches, even those labelled "Free Christian," stand for that greatest of all religious affirmations?

(2) Even if Mahomedans and Jews are Unitarians, are not we Christian Unitarians? And should we discard the name because it describes one belief held by others who are not Christians?

(3) Is not "Unitarian Christian" more descriptive and more accurate as distinguishing us from non-Christian Unitarians and non-Unitarian Christians? And does it not also enable us to claim kinship with both?

(4) Can the wit of man devise any other name that will "represent our particular beliefs" as correctly or adequately? If so, by all means let us see it.

(5) Does not "Free Christian" arrogated to one section, and that a small section of the Christian Church, by implication deny either freedom or Christianity or both to other sections, which claim both words as describing their position also?

(6) If the idea is Catholicity, why "Christian" and not "Unitarian"? On Mr. Whitaker's own showing the latter is less exclusive and leaves us more free to fraternise and co-operate with all believers in the one God, whether Mahomedans, Jews, Brahmins, or others.

(7) If we try to discard the label, will it cease to stick? Will not other Christians continue to describe us by it, and regard any change as an attempt to run away from, or, at any rate, belittle, the one great affirmation that does distinguish us amongst the Christian Churches, that constitutes our greatest glory, and the acceptance of which, not of necessity but in practice, does generally lead to the acceptance of our other affirmations and negations.

Many to whom, like myself, the name is endeared by experiences of mental and spiritual suffering and struggle, would grieve to lose, for the sake of popularity, a name that is to us an inspiration. We prefer to bear the cross; indeed, like Paul, we glory in it.

(8) Why not let the matter rest, leaving each individual church to adopt the name it prefers? Would not that be more free, as well as more Christian and more consonant with our history, principles, and policy?

H. G. CHANCELLOR.

SIR,—Interesting as the name "Unitarian" is historically, and convenient as it is to express the theological ideas of most of us attending and maintaining open-trust churches, I think with Mr. Whitaker that associations like the B. and F.U.A., whose main purpose is the support of our open-trust churches, would do very well to drop so inappropriate, for them, because denominational, a name. I am not, however, in favour, like Mr. Whitaker, of adopting "Free Christian"; but I would follow the example of associations of later birth than the B. and F.U.A. but helping to do well the same work, i.e., the helping of such open-trust churches as require help. I allude to the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, The Sustentation Fund, The Liverpool District Missionary Association, and many other local associations.

These associations are not in any way handicapped by being without a denominational name, whereas any denominational name must necessarily handicap the usefulness of institutions and societies connected with open-trust churches, the case of the Unitarian Home Missionary College being the most recent example. I never can understand people conscientiously believing in the principle of open-trust churches and at the same time holding on to a denominational name for one of the colleges intended to educate ministers of those churches.

Many people feel the name attached to the college at Manchester such a direct blow to the open-trust principle that they do not support it, and so a college doing good work is handicapped on account of its name. The same, I maintain, applies in a minor degree to the name "Unitarian" in the B. and F.U.A., and I wish, like Dr. Tillotson about the Athanasian Creed, that "we were well rid of it."

MR. CARPENTER'S LECTURES.

AN IMPRESSION.

FOR a long time I had wished to hear Professor Carpenter, but it was not till quite recently I was able to attend his opening lecture at Birmingham, in the course on "The Christ of the Creeds and the Christ of Experience."

I do not think I have ever before been quite so much impressed with a lecturer and his lecture. Professor Carpenter has a most winning personality. His is a face you do not easily forget. The whole expression lightens up. You instinctively feel that a very good man with singular powers of intellect and refinement stands before his audience. When he came forward to the little platform he found a room simply packed with earnest men and women anxious to learn from an eminent expert. It would have been interesting to have analysed the component parts of the assembly. So many churchfolk, so many chapelfolk, so many neither one nor the other. There was no question as to the interest displayed. Probably all would not agree with the lecturer, but certainly all would acknowledge the deep reverent spirit, the masterly grasp of facts, the remarkable vividness, and the exquisite delineation, all of which characterised the discourse. Professor Carpenter understands an audience. He knows the force of an appeal to heart as well as head, and that sentiment and pathos can never be negligible quantities where human sympathies and necessities are concerned.

Might one be pardoned for supposing that all that could possibly be said on the subject of Jesus Christ had already been spoken? Mr. Carpenter's lecture was a direct challenge to such dogmatism. He gave us a new picture in a new setting of the Man of Nazareth. In a very real sense the Christ of the distant past was once more imbued with life and presented just as he was. If it is objected that such naturalistic treatment savours of an irreverent familiarity, the answer lies in the effect on the hearers. That effect can be stated in the case of at least one attentive auditor. It seemed as though for the first time reality was allowed to take possession of the incidents and environments associated with the life of Jesus. His parentage, his individuality, his characteristics, his impressions, his education, were all depicted with precision and skill. The mirror was indeed held up to nature.

This first lecture was introductory to the course. The early days of Jesus, the pervading ideas of the time, the general expectancy, the state of religious feeling—these were vividly pictured. One noticeable feature about the methods employed is the adherence to strict logic. "I give you nothing without authority" was the keynote to the whole. "I give you nothing without proof" was the corollary. One felt one had no alternative but to trust and follow.

In listening to the Professor, the impression of "coming to close quarters" with the subject was uppermost. Somehow, it is the quality of reserve which, in religious matters, seems to be predominant. After many years of hearing sermons, it is apt to dawn upon one that something has been withheld. The pulpit—I speak of the orthodox—deals in half truths and thinks it wiser to practise homœopathy.

Professor Carpenter believes in his message—a simple, direct appeal from history and experience to the mind and heart of the individual. I may never see or hear him again, but recollection will ever hold clear the personality and teaching of a highly gifted intellectual and spiritual man. W. H. J.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE.

THOSE of your readers who have long memories may not yet have forgotten the record of a memorable meeting at Mill Hill Chapel on the first day of the new century. On that day there assembled for conference and consecration in that stately building representatives from nearly all, if not all, our scattered congregations in this big county. Those of us who participated in the proceedings felt the force of this assembling together for high and holy purpose. And when we held conference on the best means of advancing the cause of liberal religion, we determined with one heart and mind to enter upon a "forward movement."

Three things we set ourselves to do. Firstly, to kindle in our congregations a desire for a devouter life by a special mission. Secondly, to raise a fund which should be devoted to the support of a minister at large, and the extension of our cause in populous centres. And thirdly, to promote the circulation of a magazine which should serve to keep our congregations acquainted with, and stimulate their interest in, our common work.

The century is still young, and each of the aims we set before us has been achieved.

As a direct outcome of the "forward movement," we have the congregation at Attercliffe. The first meetings were held in a stuffy committee-room of the Vestry Hall. After awhile an upper room in the same building became available, and was engaged. Under the fostering care of a committee drawn from the two Sheffield congregations and the ministers of Upper Chapel, the congregation and Sunday-school increased. Now, chiefly through the zeal of Mr. Street, they are looking towards the erection of a mission hall which will afford them greater facilities for development. The memorial stone of the new building will be laid by Mrs. R. T. Eadon on Thursday, November 23. The cost, including purchase of land, will be about £1,650, towards which about £1,300 has been raised, including grants from the Yorkshire Bazaar Fund and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The ladies of the three Sheffield congregations have been working very zealously for some time past with a view to a bazaar shortly to be held, when it is hoped that the tota amount needed to defray the cost of this new extension will be raised.

The success of this new movement is due, in large measure, to the fine spirit of co-operation manifested in the Sheffield congregations. It would be good if neighbouring congregations in different parts of the county could be similarly drawn more closely together in common effort—good for the cause, and good for the congregations themselves. It is a misfortune, however, that so many of our churches are too distantly remote from each other to permit of active fellowship. And in cases where only a few miles separate the churches, they are so embued with the spirit of independence that it is difficult to bring them together for mutual aid.

The problem of effective co-operation is one which will sooner or later have to be faced. Sheffield has solved it in large measure. It is worthy of consideration in other districts. We have got into the way of regarding Leeds as a common centre. It is too remote from even such places as Lydgate, Elland, and Pepperhill to be a centre for effective co-operation; much too remote from Scarborough, Malton and Hull. The cost in time and money for free mingling of the congregations is too great. But why not have four centres with this effective co-operation in view, e.g., Mill Hill—with Selby, Hunslet, Holbeck, Dewsbury and Wakefield within easy reach of each other; Bradford—with Idle, Pudsey, and Pepperhill; Halifax—with Lydgate, Huddersfield, and Elland? The Sheffield congregations are already in close touch with Doncaster, Rotherham and Stannington. I venture to suggest that if the neighbouring congregations in the four centres indicated could be drawn into closer association by periodic rallys, or for some common purpose, much real strengthening would result.

I have said we have come to regard Leeds as a common centre. It is so in one respect, at least. It is the centre and source whence the greater part of the Funds required for carrying on the work of the Yorkshire Union are drawn. When we consider that the Mill Hill congregation contributes almost as much as all the other congregations in Yorkshire together, to the funds of the Union, besides supporting handsomely the other congregations in Leeds, and responding to numerous appeals from different parts of the country, it must be admitted that Leeds is an important centre indeed. In this respect, as in many others, Mill Hill sets a noble example worthy of emulation. It only needs that other important congregations in the county should follow its example in contributing according to their ability, to put the funds of the Union in such a condition as will enable the committee to engage fearlessly in extended operations.

There is a spirit of hopefulness at the present time in most of our churches. Even in places where the congregations are small, and where the work of keeping alive the liberal faith is specially difficult, there is no sign of despondency. From different parts of the field there are indications that the forward movement has not spent its force.

The congregation at Dewsbury is receiving attention at the hands of the Rev. Henry Cross, who was appointed assistant district minister six months ago. He comes with a splendid record of work at Stockton, and is giving himself without reserve to his new charge. Already there are signs of improvement, and his zeal will in time bear good fruit. The little congregation at Selby has recently been rejoicing in the acquisition of a new, neatly furnished chapel, now free from debt. The people at Lydgate are making steadily for the attainment of a much-needed new school building, and other improvements. The Elland congregation has built a new vestry and made the interior of the Church more comfortable and attractive. The congregation at the rural upland, known as Pepperhill, is now worshipping in a renovated chapel. It is hardly necessary to say that whilst liberal grants from the Bazaar Fund have been made to aid these various schemes, a good deal is left to local effort.

My good friends at Upperthorpe are entering on a big enterprise. The year of the jubilee of the congregation is approaching, and they are bent upon celebrating it worthily. For some time it has been evident that there is little hope of increasing the congregation in the present chapel. They have with perfect unanimity, therefore, determined to dispose of the old property, and to build a new church in a position more accessible to the majority of the members. A suitable site has been secured, and the Committee will soon be in a position to consider plans for the new building.

When Mr. Street penned his last provincial Letter from the Yorkshire District he referred in appreciative terms to the labours of the venerable pastor, the Rev. Iden Payne, as then on active service at Stannington. On the completion of a 21 years' ministry at that place our dear friend retired, and bid an affectionate farewell to his beloved flock, having completed a longer term of service than any other minister in our body. A large gathering assembled to do him honour, and to express the hope that, in the eventide, he might have rest and joy in his labours. Eight weeks later a larger gathering assembled to pay a tribute of respect to all that was mortal of our good friend. His was a beautiful and gracious life of faithful ministry. May the congregation, thus left shepherdless, soon find a pastor who will go in and out among them in his spirit.

The Scarborough Church and Yorkshire Unitarianism have lost one of the best of friends and supporters in the death of Mr. H. J. Morton; and the Hull congregation one of its most cultured and devoted workers, in the death of Mr. Donald Wilson. The obituaries of these good men have recently appeared in your columns. An account of the Yorkshire Churches would not be complete without, at least, mention of our loss. Their places will be hard to fill.

At Pudsey everything was going well. There were large and enthusiastic congregations; the Sunday School was vigorous; the institutions were in a most flourishing condition. These were happy auguries for a long and happy ministry. Mr. Lockett was to be congratulated on all counts. Unfortunately, the severity of the northern climate, and the strain of the work, were too much for him, and he was obliged to resign his ministry. We honour him for his own sake, and for the work he did in our district during his short stay; we sympathise with him in his affliction; and we ardently pray that he may be restored to health, by his residence at Davos Platz, so that he may yet devote himself to the work he loves, and for which he is so well qualified. The congregation is to be congratulated on so speedily coming to a decision to appoint a successor to Mr. Lockett, and the Rev. Alfred Amey is to be congratulated upon his appointment. He will labour under conditions vastly different from those to which he has been accustomed in the Eastern Counties. He will be heartily welcomed into this district. He will find a united and enthusiastic congregation, and if he enters upon his work in the right spirit, a happy and useful career lies before him among these sturdy folk.

So much for a general survey of the district. We have no brilliant results to chronicle, but the outlook is decidedly hopeful. Our greatest need is to concentrate our forces, and then to advance.

There has been a complete change in the active officials of the Union. Messrs. Henry Lupton, G. E. Verity, and Rev. A. H. Dolphin have taken the places of men who have served the churches faithfully and well. As President, Treasurer, and Secretary, respectively, these gentlemen do not mean to be lacking in service. In order, therefore, the better to equip themselves for their duties, they have offered to visit each of the congregations, so that they may act on a full knowledge of the strength and needs of our churches.

Our new venture at Barnsley is decidedly promising. We have established regular Sunday evening services at the Arcade hall. The number in attendance, so far this autumn, has averaged about 25 adults, mostly men. A few are Unitarian by conviction, and from old association. The larger proportion have discovered that our message answers their need. It is too early yet to say whether a permanent congregation will be the outcome. The most one can say now is that the outlook is very hopeful.

The discovery of isolated and lonely Unitarians and Liberal Christians, during the progress of the work at Barnsley, has convinced me that it would be good to adopt the method of the Rev. W. Channing Brown, of Massachussetts, and to attempt to form on his lines, in Yorkshire, a "Church of the Unattached." The Yorkshire Union Committee have asked me to endeavour to find out by means of advertisement, Unitarians and Liberal Christians who reside at places remote from our churches. When I am able to present a reasonable scheme the Committee will give it due consideration. The initial difficulty is to get into touch with these isolated fellow-believers. My advertisements, so far, have brought me a few replies; but there must be many Unitarians and Liberal Christians in populous centres where no Unitarian church exists, and in small villages in remote parts of Yorkshire, who would be glad to have fellowship with those like-minded in thought and worship. If this copy of the INQUIRER should reach any such, and this letter should be read, I should be glad to correspond. I conclude with expressing my belief that a better spirit is coming into our churches; and that now, with closer fellowship, clearer aims, and a distinct purpose, each to do our part faithfully, in spreading the reasonable gospel of God's Fatherhood and Man's Brotherhood, in the spirit of Jesus, we shall go forward to greater achievements in the cause of righteousness and truth than our churches in Yorkshire have hitherto chronicled for a generation past. JOHN ELLIS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Carlisle.—The twenty-second anniversary of the Viaduct Church was celebrated on Sunday and Monday last, the Rev. A. Thornhill preaching three times on the Sunday to augmented congregations. Tea was served to upwards of ninety persons on Monday. The Mayor of Newcastle, Alderman Baxter-Ellis, J.P., was to have presided, but, being unexpectedly deterred, Mr. Edmondson, chairman of the church committee, filled his place. An address by the minister, in which he reviewed the work of the church and its institutions, was very cordially received. He showed that the attendance at the services was steadily improving and for the past three months averaged over fifty in the morning and nearly ninety in the evening. The guild was active; the band of hope, with an average of forty in attendance, was doing excellent work among the young; a minister's class for adults had been organised, and a recreation club for the young people. Mr. Thornhill pleaded for more workers and for energetic efforts to still further increase the number of worshippers. A musical programme followed. It may be of interest to add that Mr. Thornhill was admitted to the M.A. degree at Cambridge on Thursday week.

Chester.—The 205th anniversary services were held in Matthew Henry's Chapel on the 12th inst. The morning service was conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Hope-street, Liverpool, and in the evening by the Rev. C. Craddock, of Toxteth Chapel, of the same city. The sermons were greatly appreciated by large congregations. Collections were taken in aid of the Sunday-school. It was with sincere sorrow that the congregation heard of the serious illness of its minister, the Rev. H. E. Haycock, who had just accepted an unanimous invitation to the pastorate of Halliwell-road Church, Bolton. Mr. Haycock was seized with what threatened to be an attack of enteric fever while the anniversary celebration was taking place in the chapel of which for the past five years he has been minister. On the 14th inst. his medical attendant reported that an improvement was noticeable, and that there was a chance of his not developing enteric after all.

Liscard.—The Grand Bazaar held in the Concert Hall, Manor-road, Nov. 9, 10 and 11, on behalf of the Memorial Church, to raise £400 to make the church self-supporting, was an unqualified success, and the congregation and their friends are to be warmly congratulated on the result. The total receipts amounted to £624 4s. 6d., including nearly £200 in donations. Many friends in Liverpool helped towards this happy result, which will be a great encouragement to the Rev. A. E. Parry and his fellow-workers.

London: Essex Church.—On Tuesday next, at 8.30, Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A., will lecture on "Ancient and Mediæval Sicily." The lecture will be illustrated by original slides, and admission is free.

Manchester District Sunday-School Association.—The Band of Hope Festival was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Saturday, Nov. 11. The choir of children, with a fair number of adults, numbered over 200 in all. The President of the Association, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, took the chair at 7 p.m., and in his opening address referred especially to the improved character of the festival. The musical arrangements were carried out in a most admirable manner under the direction of Mr. O. H. Heys, himself a musical enthusiast and an ardent teetotaler, who expressed himself afterwards as delighted with the children's singing. Two fine practical addresses were given by Mr. John Heys and the Rev. Chas. Peach. Mr. Heys roused the sympathy of his audience by an appeal to the children to remain firm and true to their pledge, declaring his conviction that if all the young people, up and down the country, would refrain from the use of alcoholic drink, in a generation, or at the most in two, the drink problem would be solved. Mr. Peach addressed himself especially to the attitude taken up by the liquor traffic, and declared that their motto, "Our trade our politics," was a serious menace to the social and moral welfare of the community. He congratulated the Association on the evident growth of the Band of Hope movement, declaring that the present festival exceeded the previous ones in the number of the choir, the increased audience, and the quality of the music.

Nottingham: High Pavement.—We have called attention in our Notes of the Week to the Musical Recital to be given in the chapel on Monday evening. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas is giving a course of Sunday evening lectures on "Religion and Poetry." The first two lectures on Wordsworth and Shelley were heard by large congregations. To-morrow, Tennyson is the subject.

Wakefield.—The annual school sermons were preached in Westgate Chapel on Sunday last by the Rev. J. E. Manning, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester. The services were musical, and the choir, which is one of the best in the city, rendered the selections in the most efficient manner. The collection for the school fund amounted to £10 5s. In the afternoon the Rev. Andrew Chalmers gave the scholars an address on the history of their Sunday-school, which was established in 1790, and is the oldest in Wakefield. From the first it gave most valuable aid to the enlightenment of the people, and so early as 1806 it had a subscription list of over £40 a year, besides annual collections. On Monday evening the annual Congregational soirée was held in the schoolrooms, when there was a large gathering in spite of the unfavourable weather. A resumé of the year's work was given by the minister, and Mr. Manning delivered an appropriate and able address. A musical programme of a high standard was greatly enjoyed, and all passed pleasantly.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

President: Rev. CHARLES C. COE, F.R.G.S.
Principal: Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON, M.A.

JUBILEE MEMORIAL FUND.

£20,000

For the Purchase, Equipment and Endowment of the Residential Collegiate Buildings, Summerville, Victoria Park.

SPECIAL APPEAL TO UNITARIANS IN LONDON AND DISTRICT.

THE following list includes new and increased donations received since the last announcement, as well as a selection from former lists. It is published now to show the support which the Fund has met with in London and District, and in the hope that it may encourage others to contribute. While the Jubilee Committee cordially appreciate the great generosity of many London Unitarians, as shown in this list, they cannot but feel that London Unitarians, as a whole, have hardly realised the claims which the College makes upon them as a national institution. The College is established in Manchester, but its students come to it from all parts, and leave it, as the Current Year Book shows, to occupy pulpits in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and other parts of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. There are many and obvious reasons why the College should be established in Manchester, especially since the creation there of the first Faculty of Theology which both teaches and examines without reference to sectarian limitations; but the College remains national in its sympathies, services, and aims. The Committee will be glad to send deputations to address congregational meetings in London and District to explain their work more in detail. Meanwhile they urgently appeal for new or (where possible) increased donations from all friends in the London District.

"UNITARIAN"-ISM.

SIR,—When so many more practised rhetoricians and disputants are ready to speak for or against this lamentable and surely most directly deleterious superstition, it would be useless for me to intrude with unskilled dialectic, or where others can speak with full inspiration the very words of the Father, I will not pretend to do either.

But I beseech you to let me call up again precious words of one of the masters who have ruled me for 70 years; I refer to the Rev. John James Tayler and the Rev. W. E. Channing.

I find in a letter of Aug. 29, 1841, Mr. Channing wrote to his friend, Mr. Trevilcock, as follows, words which, for the promotion of Open Brotherhood, of the Christianity of Jesus and of the Kingdom of God within us, seem to me appropriate:—

"Your religious experience, as you relate it, has been fitted to carry you forward. There are advantages in having known error and felt its power, if we are so happy as to escape from it. We know the truth more distinctly by contrast. We have a wider field for observation and comparison, and, what is of great importance, we can understand the feelings of those from whom we differ, and do them greater justice. I am strongly opposed to Methodism, not for its speculative errors, but for its spirit of domination. No sect seems to me more fettered, or to have more the spirit of a sect. It is a religious aristocracy, combining a great power for narrow ends. As I grow older, I grieve more and more at the impositions on the human mind, at the machinery by which the few keep down the many. I distrust sectarian influence more and more. I am more detached from a denomination, and strive to feel more my connection with the Universal Church, with all good and holy men. I am little of a Unitarian; have little sympathy with the system of Priestley and Belsham, and stand aloof from all but those who strive and pray for clearer light, who look for a purer and more effectual manifestation of Christian truth."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE sermon preached in the Cathedral of Geneva on Aug. 28, by the Rev. J. E. Roberty, of Paris, at the inauguration of the Third International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, was published in the October number of the "Revue Chrétienne." We are glad to offer to our readers this week an English translation of the sermon by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas.

THE completed volume of Proceedings of the International Council is expected to be issued early in the new year. M. Roberty's sermon, together with the two presidential addresses and the sermon preached by the Rev. Charles Wagner on the following Sunday, have already been issued as a separate pamphlet, in the form in which they will appear in the complete volume. We hope soon to publish a translation of Mr. Wagner's sermon also.

THE Martineau Memorial Fund at Norwich, for the erection of schools and a memorial hall in connection with the Octagon Chapel, it will be seen from the list advertised this week, has made substantial progress; but the progress is slow, and there is still need of some £2,000 more for the adequate completion of the scheme. We note with special pleasure a donation of £134 17s. from fifty-four of Dr. Martineau's old students.

MISINFORMED gossip dies hard. A note in the Westminster Gazette of Nov. 3 on the "Disappearance of Addis Hall" stated that Mr. Addis, "having recently conformed to the Established Church, has intimated to the Vice-Chancellor that he will not seek renewal of the licence for Addis Hall, Oxford." This and other misstatements were corrected by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, in a letter which appeared in the Westminster Gazette of Nov. 10, and again on the following day, by the Rev. Henry Gow, one of the secretaries of the College. Yet the Daily News on Nov. 18, àpropos of the announcement that Mr. Addis was to preach at Westminster Abbey on Sunday morning, repeated the statement that Mr. Addis had "recently resigned the private hostelry called Addis Hall, which he held in connection with Manchester College."

BOTH Dr. Drummond and Mr. Gow had already explained that Mr. Addis's connection with the Oxford Hall remains precisely what it was. He has not resigned, and there has been no question as to his relation to the Residence and the students of Manchester College. The question of the renewal of the licence of the Hall was purely technical, as between the University and the College authorities, for whom Mr. Addis, as head of the Hall, had to act.

WE have referred from time to time to the Lay Preachers' Training Class, conducted by the Rev. Professor Garvie. This class aims both to assist those who are engaged in the tremendously important task of unprofessional preaching, and also to stimulate and instruct young men who look forward to joining the ranks. In both respects it is worthy of imitation amongst us, and from the latest of Dr. Garvie's lectures we take some sentences, which are valuable for all preachers, except those men of genius who need no guidance. "It is not merely an intellectual, but also an emotional and volitional communication which constitutes real preaching. But this emotion must not be undirected and uncontrolled excitement, because then there will be heat only, without light, and without work. Volition must check and guide emotion. The preacher must will to do something, and he must concentrate the energy of his will on that purpose. Preaching is a deed, and not a word only. A resolute purpose and a strenuous energy in the preacher have a commanding influence over his hearers. To feel deeply and will strongly is as necessary to the preacher as to think clearly. Even in regard to the mind, it is the whole mind which is to be exercised. Preachers are prone to pay too exclusive attention to the reason which apprehends truth, and the conscience which appreciates duty, to present only arguments to the one or to bring constraints to bear on the other; but the imagination is in most persons the most direct channel of approach and appeal both to reason and conscience."

THE present rather critical position of the London Missionary Society is giving rise to a good deal of criticism and recrimination among its directors and supporters. The financial difficulty, which is becoming acute, may be directly traced to the flickering out of the enthusiasm evoked a few years ago by the Forward Movement for sending out 100 additional missionaries. More than half this number was actually despatched, and now the reaction has come. In the words of one of the directors:—"Schools have been closed, native teachers dismissed, isolated stations transferred to other societies, missionaries left with insufficient accommodation, retrenchment carried almost to the verge of cruelty." What is to be done? Two positions are taken up: first, that the work ought to be limited to the mandate of the churches as expressed in the subscriptions. But, on the other hand, it is urged that there is a peremptory call from God which must in any case be carried out, to evangelise the whole world. Meantime, the number increases of those Christians who doubt if it is indeed our duty to overthrow the faiths of India and Japan, whether the name Christian is the only divine passport. The real difficulty of a missionary society lies in the growth of this thought, and is hardly likely to become less as time goes on.

HAVING retired from the active ministry, Dr. John Watson is making public confession in a series of articles in the British Weekly on "What might have been." The first article, on November 9, dealt with training for the ministry, and contained some interesting autobiographical particulars. Dr. Watson explains that he was not early destined for the ministry and had no overmastering sense of vocation, but entered the Church at his parents' direction, becoming a communicant for the first time to fulfil the conditions of entry at the Theological College. Thus, while he gained broader sympathies and knowledge of men, he deplores the deficiencies of his professional training, which, he holds, ought to have begun much earlier. It was only after graduation that his mind awoke to real interest in philosophy, and when he entered New College, at Edinburgh, for his special ministerial training, he had little interest in theology. The blame for the defects in his theological training he divides between himself and the system of the college.

HE was at that time keenly interested in philosophy, and also in modern literature, and before he left New College, Dr. Watson acknowledges, theology began to take her place in his mind "as the queen of mental science." "But it was too late for me to overtake the sessions I had lost, and therefore I have suffered all my ministry under a double disability. I have been perpetually repairing the omissions of the past, and I have never had the thorough and easy working mastery of professional knowledge which every man should have, and especially one holding important charges. What I have learned I have had to acquire with double labour, and sometimes to the neglect of other duties. No week passes in which I do not mourn the misapplication of at least two years out of my four years' course in the theological hall and my partial isolation from its theological life."

THE account Dr. Watson gives of his professors at New College is very interesting. He speaks warmly of the late Professor A. B. Davidson and of Dr. Rainy; but the other five professors, though all "excellent men," were "absolutely inefficient," and that was perfectly well known to the students and to the Church. From his own painful experiences Dr. Watson makes the following suggestions as to the system of theological colleges:—"For one thing, the Chairs should be filled by men at the height of their power, and who are acknowledged experts in their subject; the professors should hold their Chairs for a certain number of years, and then if they be efficient be re-elected; certain subjects, such as Old and New Testament anguages and criticism, and possibly dogma, should be compulsory, and a man should be obliged to choose, in addition, one or two more subjects out of Church history, Apologetic, Christian Ethics, social economy, palæography, and such like. He should have liberty to go from college to college where he can find the best teachers. And before he leaves his college the student should be carefully trained in pastoral theology. It is not just and it is not moral that a man should be sent forth to the work of the holy ministry who does not know how to preach, who has never been trained to conduct a service, who has not been instructed in pastoral work, who has no idea what to say to men when they come with their doubts or with their sins, and who is not in contact with the living thought of the day. Until lately theological colleges were the most inefficient institutions in the world of education, and the sufferers from this sin are scattered up and down the ministry of the Christian Church."

WE are promised for next week a letter from the Secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association, in answer to the letter of the Rev. Alexander Webster which appeared last week.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.

DENOMINATION.

SIR,—I have read with considerable interest the letter of Mr. Whitaker in your last issue. I sympathise with its intention, if, in spite of its definite pleading, it is to discover a single name which can indicate the plan of our churches in the conception of a Christian Church Universal, and at the same time cover by terminological inclusion the widely divergent theological opinions which the pulpits of our churches severally express.

But, apart from the discussion of any other name, which Mr. Whitaker's letter necessarily presupposes, the immediate question may be raised, whether the term "Free Christian" does not assume two conditions which are not universally existent among our churches. (1) Are all Christian? Are there not some which would more accurately be designated, "Theistic," without any qualifying adverb? (2) Are all free? Are there not some which, by tradition or the chief terms of their trust-deeds, are closely bound to doctrines rather rigidly prescribed?

But, again, apart from this, there are two other questions which, urged from different sides, might deprive Mr. Whitaker's proposition of its future utility. (1) Do our churches as a whole intend always to prescribe their teaching within the limits of theology and ethics which are Christian?

I know that such papers as that of Prof. Jacks in the last "Hibbert," and sermons akin in their open sympathy with extra-Christian ideals, have opened discussions in different quarters more than once. (2) Has not the time come when our denominational conception of "freedom," in theology and church polity, seriously requires overhauling? I have known some congregations in which the "freedom" was a more lively element than the Christianity; and these have compelled my reflection that, perhaps, a more consistent regard and study of what the Christian scriptures most definitely represent would be better than a code of belief that is anarchical and seemingly incapable of self-consistence. My feeling is that a restriction of liberty in certain directions, which I need not here indicate, would be salutary, better for the clear pronouncement of the main doctrines our churches teach, better for the governmental discipline they sadly need. My own work so far in our denomination—a kind of work which the denomination seems almost deliberately to evade—has been to add numbers to it, to secure more heads for counting, because, in the dwindling process which has been evident on all hands—a fact revealed in every one of our district associations, I venture to suggest—numbers do matter. As things are, the work one minister does through years of painful industry and self-sacrifice may in a few months be utterly ruined under condition of that "freedom," which allows some other who may come afterwards to interpret Christianity with reference to little else than his pre-conceptions and prejudices and to reverse all existing methods of congregational government. Is this fact one of the glories of our free position? I regard it as an evil from which a sure release is imperatively to be sought.

Now, sir, I for one, who love the Unitarian name, and have in my self-imposed effort to call new congregations together never found it to be a hindrance to any person who seriously desired spiritual communion along with me, am willing to accept any new name to which our denomination can unanimously give its assent. We are so disrupt that to secure real unity on any single point, however secondary, would be a gain, perhaps a step towards the forming us into a living church. At present we see a few churches, many of which are virtually dead; this, because they constitute not a body corporate but are severally limbs without any sense of any connection with anything else. Two of our congregations a mile apart are as distant for any purposes of association and fellowship and common work as though they were sundered by a thousand leagues.

Who shall lead us? We have long awaited one, powerful in our churches, to call us out of our dispersion, to bring us truly together, to unite us into one coherent and substantial whole, to make us a church militant and triumphant, and to lay upon us a common name.

WILLIAM C. HALL.

Small Heath, November 14, 1905.

SIR,—The remarks of Mr. W. W. Bruce at the Provincial Assembly of London, and the South Eastern Counties, and Mr. Whitaker's letter in your issue of yesterday, raise once more the question of the comparative failure or little success of the churches commonly called Unitarian, attributing that failure largely to the use of the name Unitarian, which does not express, or expresses very poorly and inaccurately, the doctrines or principles of those churches.

Although agreeing almost entirely with Mr. Whitaker's letter, so far as it goes, I am afraid the trouble is really deeper than he supposes, and is not one of name merely. As an ordinary layman—for some time now, in fact, an outsider—seeing perhaps a different side of matters to that usually presented to a minister, I am of opinion that Mr. Whitaker greatly underestimates the number of "Unitarians" who desire not a Free Church, a Free Christian Church, a Free Catholic Church, a Church of Open Brotherhood; but a Unitarian Church, a National Church, a Theistic Church, a Jesuan Church as opposed to a Christian Church. I have known great indignation aroused in a "Unitarian" congregation by a sermon on "The value of the doctrine of the Trinity"; but why, if "Unitarians" are unanimously, or almost unanimously, in favour of a Free Church? Or again, although the average "Unitarian" may greatly favour the open trust deed as giving opportunities for progress, I do not think he usually includes in his ideas of progress, such changes as have occurred in the individual case of Mr. Addis. To these members of the churches—who, I am inclined to think, constitute at least a powerful minority—the fact that the etymological meaning of the word Unitarian has proved must stronger than its historical connections is no great source of difficulty, and it is the existence of this element which really stands in the way of that action by the body as a whole which Mr. Whitaker desires. There does not appear to me to be any absolute necessity for united and simultaneous action by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on the one hand, and the churches on the other. The great problem seems to lie in the path of the churches. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association might at once adopt some such title as the "Rational Religion Missionary Society" apparently without embarrassing the churches.

Supposing the difficulty really is as described by Mr. Whitaker, and a new name is generally adopted, would not the churches gain in many ways by avoiding the use of the name "Christian," leaving themselves perfectly open to assimilate the good from any and every religion?

But supposing that the difficulty is what I have tried to point out, shall the matter be pressed even at the risk of separation within such a small body of churches? My reply to that question would be that the present position is an impossible one, and that probably, after the shock of parting, each of the two churches or groups of churches spoken of above would, in less than twenty years, be stronger than the group of churches commonly called Unitarian now is.

THOMAS STEVENSON.

49, St. Helen's-road, Bolton.

SIR,—I have lived almost all my life amongst Churchmen and other orthodox Christians, and out of reach of one of our chapels. Amongst my most intimate friends, I have invariably numbered the vicar or chaplain, wherever I have lived, at home and abroad. If I had told any of these that I was a "Free Christian," I feel confident that the rejoinder would have been, "What is that?" whereas the simple statement that I was a Unitarian gained me admittance at once into friendship and Christian fellowship alongside the thousands of broad churchmen within the fold of the church to-day.

Amongst the laity I have invariably found a very slender dividing line between their position and our own, but I do not think that any alteration of name will make us, as a "sect," any more attractive to even the very broadest of them. Mankind is far too conservative and stubborn in matters of religious custom. I, personally, shudder when I hear a lesson read in one of our chapels from a book other than the Bible, though I sit patiently under a twenty-five minutes reading from the pulpit of still inferior matter. Similarly, most churchmen cannot bear the idea of tampering with the prayer-book, and they prefer the church with its earnestness, fellowship, sanctity, and time-honoured formulas to something possibly more in harmony with their intellect alone.

Our views are winning all the same, slowly and surely. Hell fire has gone from the pulpit, and so has the resurrection of the body and the verbal inspiration of the Bible. The Athanasian creed is doomed, and the laity put their own constructions on the other creeds, whatever the clergy, who are bound by the 39 articles, may do. Mr. Whitaker is too impatient if he is not satisfied with the present rate of progress.

ARTHUR E. JONES.

Dawlish, Nov. 21, 1905.

SIR,—The chronic discussion of the name "Unitarian" runs to waste for want of a clear understanding of the real question at issue. In considering the use of a name, the first question to be decided is, What do we wish to name, and what attributes are to be indicated by the name chosen?

In the present case we desire to refer by name to beliefs, to persons, and to churches. Some writers apply the name "Unitarian" to all these indiscriminately. Others (with whom I agree) call certain beliefs and believers Unitarian; while they refuse to call certain churches Unitarian, not because the name is unpopular, but because it is inappropriate. Neither are they ashamed to bear the name personally, if it describes their religious belief. After all, this is a man's own concern.

The question is, How shall certain churches be named?

The churches here under discussion may be regarded in two aspects. (1) They exist for the worship of God and are free from fixed doctrinal limitations, both membership and trusts being "open." (2) In this freedom they have become practically unanimous in rejecting some important doctrines of the great Christian Churches and embracing larger and richer thoughts of the unity and Fatherhood of God and the nature and progress of man. Some minds are chiefly interested in the first aspect, and others in the second; but there will be no end to the hitherto useless and wearisome discussion until it is decided whether the required name is to refer to the one character or to the other.

The ecclesiastical and the theological positions are distinct ideas, requiring different names. The word "Unitarian" is a very valuable one to indicate a type of religious faith. Like many others, I am thankful to have been brought up in that faith, and I strongly believe that the religion of the future will be its close kindred. Some of our friends make a great mistake in stretching the term to cover the church position also. Confusion is the result, and a useful theological term is lost for practical purposes. I call myself and my belief Unitarian, but is it right for me to call my church by that name? Many of us ask this question, and answer, "No, the church stands for far more than my particular opinions; it stands for the worship of God and the ever-fresh communication of his truth and life to men."

Here is the supreme matter to which our minds ought to be directed at this time. A church is not a society for maintaining and propagating certain religious doctrines, but for the worship and service of a divine Person. Teaching is necessary to help the thoughts of men and to stir their spiritual life. Many minds are estranged from religion by shallow science and false philosophy. Clear these minds of the scientific cant of the day, and not a few would readily resort once more to the inner life of a growing communion with the divine. The freedom of our churches offers a wonderful opportunity. Religious people are already rising above the question of names and sects. As we grow in religious life we shall be content to have "churches," with or without a name, so only that we are free from the artificial restrictions of man's device and can worship the Father in spirit and in truth. Are we becoming more religious? I dare not say. Yet it is quite certain that if our churches are to do real service, we must not be absorbed in doctrines and other mental representations of divine truth; but every one of us, according to the measure of his higher nature, must have a sincere personal relation with the living God.

May we all be one in this prayer and endeavour to be true!

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

SIR,—I am afraid your correspondent Mr. Wilkes-Smith, has, no doubt, unintentionally, mis-read my letter. He refers to the preliminary and not to the final decision of the Provincial Assembly by fifty-three to seven to merely "receive" the report on Public Questions. It is difficult to describe this decision otherwise than as "almost unanimous," but this description he condemns. He further confuses the statement that the report contained sentiments "distasteful to all but hot political partisans," with his own gloss that the opponents of the amendment, whom he identifies with zeal for righteousness, were so termed. The raw political feeling, of which I quoted what seemed to me to be instances, is not softened by Mr. Wilkes-Smith's use of the word "slavery" for what the report described as "a strong likeness to slavery." In pursuance of this method, your correspondent accuses me of thrusting aside the plea for peace, "because it might hurt poor Lord Roberts's feelings," whereas I referred simply "to the patriotic warnings of Lord Roberts." It would seem that your correspondent is qualifying himself for the epithet he condemns. After all, even hot political partisans should deal fairly with opponents. It is not by hysterical shouts of "Peace" that peace can be preserved, but by that timely preparation for its maintenance which Lord Roberts and all wise lovers of peace enjoin. To stigmatise this as fomenting the war spirit is to mis-use plain terms. In conclusion, I have no objection to the sentiments which close your correspondent's letter, but would point out that the "right to vote" is statutory and not sentimental.

ARMYTAGE BAKEWELL.

ISOLATED UNITARIANS.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me, through your correspondence columns, to put in a plea for isolated Unitarians and Liberal Christians? Until we have a church in every populous centre, and in every suburb of the large cities, there must be many who, at one time, were devoted members of our churches, but who are now, from business and other circumstances, compelled to live in districts where we have no church: There must be many others, out of accord with orthodoxy, who would gladly join a Unitarian congregation were one within reasonable reach from their residence. We have a duty to such as these. They are lonely and wanting fellowship in a larger faith.

Our American brother, Rev. W. Channing Brown, has discovered a way to minister to the needs of these lonely ones. It is, through the postal service, to send, at regular intervals, a personal message, together with devotional literature.

I have a desire to adopt his methods, and have the hearty good-will of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union Committee. The initial difficulty is to discover those one wishes to help. So far advertisements have brought few replies. It will greatly assist me, in this work, if readers of this letter will be good enough to send me the names and addresses of friends residing in places remote from our churches, who would welcome such fellowship as this means of communication would afford.

JOHN ELLIS.

PROFESSOR HARNACK, we learn from a letter of his to Dr. Newton Marshall, in this week's Christian World, though he has accepted the post of librarian of the Royal Library at Berlin, has not resigned his professorship in the University.

A MEETING of the Society of Friends of Russian Freedom is to be held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, when an address will be given by Dr. Soskice, Editor of Free Russia, on the present situation in that country. The chair will be taken at 8 o'clock by Mr. L. T. Hobhouse, M.A.

"A UNITARIAN Martyr" is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. It describes the pilgrimage made to the Servetus monument at Geneva, on occasion of the recent international meetings in that city. "Of the many impressive scenes," the preacher said, "which I witnessed that week none seemed to me so full of interest, at once actual and historical, as the procession of English and American Unitarians which bore the wreath to lay upon the death-place of Servetus. It was right that the rugged granite of 'this expiatory monument' should have been erected on the spot where he suffered martyrdom, by those who could properly style themselves 'Respectful and grateful sons of Calvin.' It was the part of us, their brethren of another race and of far-off lands, reverently to approve their act, and to lay the fading flowers of our sympathy and praise beside the abiding monument of their condemnation and regret." And from that text the sermon went on to speak of the evils of bigotry, the truer ideal of religious fellowship, and the heretic's faithfulness unto death.

PROFESSOR HENRY JONES'S MARTINEAU ADDRESS.*

II.

WE will now endeavour to give some slight idea of the reply which we believe would be given to Professor Jones's main argument by thinkers who are in substantial sympathy with Dr. Martineau's philosophy. It must be admitted that some of the positions which Dr. Martineau defended and considered of importance are now abandoned by many of his pupils as untenable, and are regarded as unessential to the validity of his general philosophy of ethics and religion. Most of his present followers would, we think, decline to accept his doctrine that infinite Space exists independently of God. Some of them, we believe, would be inclined also to question his limitation of metaphysical causality to self-conscious minds; and would not refer the phenomena of the physical cosmos directly to God's causality, but rather to the infinite number of finite and dependent causes, such as our own souls, which owe their being and their special character to that eternal "Cause of causes," out of whose substance they are formed, and who by His immanence in each and all embraces in one sublime unity all the physical and psychical entities which constitute the universe.

But while there is much in Dr. Martineau's thinking, as in that of all eminent philosophers, which is unessential and deciduous, and about which his followers may differ without departing from genuine discipleship, there are other principles of his philosophy which cannot be rejected without the entire collapse of his ethical and theistic constructions. We need not say that it is against these basal principles that Professor Jones's vigorous dialectic is directed.

In the earlier part of the address Professor Jones appears to have imperfectly apprehended Dr. Martineau's statement, at the beginning of the "Types of Ethical Theory," that in our reasonings about ethics we must start with Man, and not with either Nature or God. In saying that we must not start with God, we understand Martineau to mean that we must not start with an idea of God which we have reached by purely intellectual processes, and then use this metaphysical conception deductively in order to prove what must necessarily be the truth about human psychology and human ethics. Dr. Martineau held that the nature of God is more fully and directly revealed to us in our ethical and spiritual experiences than it can possibly be in à priori conceptions formulated by the intellect alone. His meaning, therefore, is that we must begin with God as He reveals Himself in human nature, including in that nature, not only its rational intuitions, but also its ethical and spiritual experiences. When, in the course of biological evolution, the human stage is reached, then that Universal Reason, that Incarnate God, who has been immanent and directive all through the evolutionary process, now begins, for the first time, to progressively reveal Himself in and to the consciousness of his rational offspring. This manifestation in our inner life of that Universal and Absolute One out of whom the evolving cosmos has proceeded is that "Master Light of all our seeing," which, by its presence, illumines and mingles with every region of our conscious life, and renders us no longer simply creatures but also sons of God. By this self-revelation in us of the absolute and eternal Ground and Cause of all finite existences, the individual soul is enabled to get beyond, and wholly transcend, the limitations of its own finite individuality; to reach the ideas of infinity and eternity, and to apprehend by degrees not only our relations to all other finite existences but also to that Eternal Trinity in Unity of Thought, Will, and Love, whose self-luminous presence in our consciousness is at once the key to the solution of the basal problems of philosophy, and the living source of all our developing ideals of Beauty, Righteousness, and Love.

As Professor Jones truly remarks, he and Dr. Martineau have one common aim, namely, to reach an interpretation of the cosmos which shall explain the inseparability in all human experience of a consciousness of unity, and a consciousness of differences. And, further, they both agree that this explanation must recognise and account for real differences as well as real unity. Dr. Martineau was fully persuaded that the final purpose and aim of the Eternal in calling into being, and sustaining in being, the multiplicity of dependent existences, was that these individuations of His own eternal substance and life should at length attain to true individuality, so that, while they are all indissolubly connected with and dependent on Him, they should at the same time be in a limited, but very real sense, other than He, and be able to stand toward Him in real personal relations. God, in Martineau's view, does not purpose in creation that the difference between Him and His creatures should be merely an apparent difference, as it would be if rational beings were merely phases or varying modes of His own eternal life. The purpose of creation is to produce at last true personalities, who can, within certain limits, freely choose whether they will work with, or will resist, that will of the Father within them, which is revealed in their progressive ethical and spiritual ideals. As Tennyson puts it—and this appeared to Dr. Martineau, though it does not seem to so appear to Professor Jones, to be an entirely different thing from saying "Our wills are never separated from, but only distinguishable from, the will of God."

"Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours to make them Thine,"

And what Tennyson meant is, we take it, precisely what Browning meant when he wrote:—

"God, whose pleasure brought
Man into being, stands away,
As it were a hand-breadth off, to give
Room for the newly made to live;
And look at Him from a place apart,
And use his gifts of brain and heart."

Now, this "hand-breadth off" appears to us to indicate that Browning's philosophy of the universe involves one, at least, of those dualistic "rifts" which are intolerable to the pure intellectualist, whose supreme demand is for such a conception of God, Nature, and Man that the cosmos shall be regarded as a rational unity, the factors of which are so interconnected and inter-dependent that the character of each one follows from and is determined by its relation to all the rest. But while this conception of the world fulfils the supreme aim of the philosophic intellectualist, it runs directly counter to the almost universal judgment of mankind on the question of the soul's relation to the external world, and it runs equally counter to that judgment on the question of the moral freedom of man; for the intellectualist's conception of man's relation to nature and to God excludes the possible possession by man of a power of choice between alternative modes of self-determination.

Dr. Martineau sides with the ordinary judgment of mankind on the question of the existence of an external world, on which man acts and which acts on him; and he also agrees with mankind in general that there are occasions in the lives of rational beings, when it is freely open to them either to sin or not to sin. He would, however, emphatically protest against the assumption that in either of these cases he is introducing any impassable or irrational gulf into his theory of the universe. In his view the Eternal Spirit, in revealing Himself in man's rational, moral, and spiritual life, awakens the ideas of infinity and eternity, and also the conviction that all the finite entities in the universe arise out of and depend for their existence on the creative activity of one Absolute or Self-existent Ground and Cause. Nothing, then, is, on this theory, really isolated either from any other person or thing in the universe, or from the one all-embracing and all-pervading Spiritual Life which unifies the whole. But, as we have before seen, Martineau points out that this immanent Eternal Spirit is as careful to create and to develop individuality as He is to cherish unity, and that, therefore, He confers on all His creatures, a faculty of putting forth energy. They are indeed in their origin differentiations or individuations of His own self-existent and infinite energy; and when the creature reaches the human stage, his individuality manifests a still higher potency and enables him to exercise a measure of freedom in the use which he makes of his causal power.

We will now turn to Professor Jones's view, and mark the point where the two theories diverge. That point lies very deep down; for it is vital to Professor Jones's theory that his individualities, however he conceives them, though they are allowed to think or know, are rigidly excluded from all causal activity. "I should like," he says, "to make this clear at least—that the idealist is committed beyond recall and without reservation to the unity of man with the system in which he lives. . . . Nor can he retain any part or element of man—not the will, nor the ghostly shadow of the will which is called 'activity'—in aloofness from the system of the real." In criticising Professor Ward's views, Professor Jones says, "It is difficult to say what this 'activity' means, or what it is; for immediately you speak of meaning, or give a thing any real character, it enters into relation." Dr. Martineau conceives this activity to stand in immediate relation to the action or energising of neighbouring individuals or entities in the cosmos. We are conscious, he thinks, of putting forth causal activity or energy; we feel that energy to be at times resisted, and, by one of those necessary laws of thought which we owe to the immanence of the Eternal in our consciousness, we refer that resistence to a foreign causality, or, in other words, we conclude, like the child in Tennyson's poem, that "we are not what we see, and other than the things we touch." Probably Professor Jones sees in this but the futile repetition of a long-exploded fallacy. It is very curious, however, that when in the address (p. 32) he is describing with much truth and vividness the growing experience of the child, he thinks proper to say nothing about that remarkable discovery of things and persons other than itself to which Tennyson and Martineau attached quite exceptional importance. Again, if Professor Jones's account of the matter were adequate, we should expect the child ere very long to see its way to a further discovery, viz., that the things and persons are not really other than itself in the sense of having some measure of separate existence, but are only distinguishable from itself, seeing that "the Not-self, or what is called the object, is that which finds its meaning, or is idealised in the self; and the self is that which unites, nay, identifies, its not-self with itself" (p. 33).

We here encounter a doctrine which is stated over and over again in this thoughtful address, namely, that subject and object form an indivisible unity. Of course, if by "object" is meant our ideas of things or persons, this is evidently true; but if we mean by "object" what Professor Jones means, namely, the actual things or persons whose physical or mental activity has led to our formation of these ideas, then we make bold to agree with Martineau and the other realistic thinkers who hold that this dogma is utterly fictitious, and is, indeed, the πρῶτον ψεῦδος which has vitiated a large section of nineteenth century philosophising. It is true that the popular notion of the perception of objects requires very great modification, for undoubtedly the perceiving self contributes out of its own resources very much of the dress with which it invests the object. But we hold that in its essential nature the popular belief is quite correct, and that Martineau is right when he maintains that all perception involves, among other things, that the metaphysical reality called the "object" does exert causal action upon the other metaphysical reality called the "subject." Professor Jones rightly informs us that it is to the great Kant that philosophy owes this epoch-making dogma, but he does not inform us that Kant himself soon found that he could not carry it through his philosophical system, and had to have recourse to the causal action of "things-in-themselves," thus virtually admitting that philosophy can by no means do without metaphysical causation. The great idealistic systems have indeed sought to carry this principle all through, but there is good reason to believe that Kant would have emphatically declined to acknowledge the paternity of such systems; for he clearly saw that these fascinating idealisms, which dispense with all metaphysical causality, gain their intellectual unification of the cosmos at the ruinous cost of sacrificing what is deepest and most precious in man's rational, ethical, and religious experience.

The more we reflect on this dogma of the inseparability of subject and object the more incredible it appears to us. Professor Jones is as real an object of the present writer's thought as is the bird, or the tree on which we see the bird has just alighted; but in what intelligible sense can we by thinking "overcome" the apparent opposition between himself and us, and by making him the object of our thought identify ourselves with him and possess him? Professor Jones's position in this address becomes the more puzzling when we read (p. 26): "If a man's ego is 'impervious,' if no other being, not even God, can occupy the point of outlook of his inner self, and look at the world of being through his eyes, it is still by means of the world that he looks at all, and God is the light of all his seeing." It would seem from this that Professor Jones himself admits that there is one feature in the inner life of every ego which no finite spirit, nor even the Infinite Spirit, can make an object of, and so identify itself with it and possess it. If this is Professor Jones's meaning, we entirely endorse it; but the conclusion we draw from it is that all spirits are not merely distinguishable from each other, but are in a very real sense separable from one another: and that what unites them in spiritual brotherhood is the immanence of the Eternal in each and all, an immanence which enables them all to share in a common spiritual experience, and yet at the same time does not annul the separateness of their wills and their individual responsibility. As Dr. Martineau expresses it in a well-known passage: "I pretend not to draw the untraceable line that separates His being from ours. The decisions of the will doubtless are our own, and constitute the proper sphere of our personal agency. But in a region higher than the will—the realm of spontaneous thought and emotion—there is scope enough for 'His abode with us.' Whatever is most deep within us is the reflection of Himself."

While Dr. Martineau's philosophy thus contends for the causal activity of all metaphysical entities, it maintains also that rational egos attain to a power of free self-determination which enables them to choose between the gratification of their own personal desires and the assimilation of their characters to that of the immanent God, who is progressively revealed in all our authoritative ideals.

As Professor Jones's philosophy does not ascribe any causal activity to individual souls, it cannot admit that there is before the ego any open alternative of siding either with its own personal desires or with the invitations and injunctions of the indwelling God. There is only one course of action open to it in all the moral crises of its existence. Yet Professor Jones evidently believes that all souls will at length learn to say, "Nevertheless, not my will, but Thine, be done."

This is expounded in a very striking and beautiful passage towards the close of the address, a passage which most of its hearers probably supposed to be in substantial accord with Dr. Martineau's Libertarian Theism, but which, when interpreted in the light of the rest of the address, is seen to be an eloquent expression of a high form of Calvinism, of a Calvinism, however, from which the objectionable features of a devil and hell have been eliminated. "When," writes Professor Jones (p. 35), "man has learnt to give up his will, his life, his self in all its compass, when he can take in both hands the cup so bitter to the natural man, and say, though with agony and sweat of blood, 'Nevertheless, not my will, but Thine, be done,' then, indeed, does he receive back his will, his life, his soul, and receive them back transfigured by their identity with the life of God." Now, by the uninitiated reader these words will probably be taken to mean that the fundamental discord which so often exists between the will of man and the will of God may, by prayer and the effort of the individual self, amid perhaps agony and sweat of blood, be converted into perfect harmony. Unfortunately, however, for this interpretation, the main burden of this brilliant address has been to show that effort by a separate self is a baseless fiction, and also to show that the opposition between the human and the Divine will involves no real separation between them, but simply a distinction, and that this opposition not only will be but actually is "overcome" every moment in the philosopher's consciousness of the unbroken and unbreakable ontological unity of all beings. And, further, in such a case as that alluded to in the above quotation, the conduct of the Absolute Idealist can hardly fail to be practically influenced by the consideration that, whichever decision he comes to—whether, on the one hand, he decides to take the heroic course, or, on the other hand, to shirk the "agony"—in both cases alike he will always have the abiding and comforting consciousness that the choice he has made was both the only possible one and also the one quite indispensable to the perfection of the cosmical whole. Surely this consideration will often be anything but a stimulus to self-sacrificing deeds involving great personal suffering. It is for this reason that, from Dr. Martineau's point of view, the philosophy so ably and so eloquently advocated in this address would appear to be not only theoretically untenable, but also morally perilous.

Professor Jones, according to a newspaper report, at the president's luncheon, given in his honour at the time of the Essex Hall Lecture, made the very interesting statement that "he had been brought up amongst the strictest and narrowest of Calvinists, and was still with them. His creed, however, had now grown much shorter, while his beliefs had grown deeper and much wider."

Calvinism, or Determinism, whether philosophical or theological, has always at first exercised much fascination over thoughtful minds, and has inspired them with wonderful energy, owing to the consciousness that the will of the infinitely wise God reigned supreme over the destinies of individuals and nations, but we believe that experience shows that in the course of time, when the ethical implications of such a system are fully realised, it is either surrendered, as is now largely the case in Scotland, or leads to apathy and fatalism, as is exemplified in Turkish Mohammedanism. If we are not mistaken that form of philosophical Calvinism, which Absolute Idealism presents, has already lost much of the power of kindling religious enthusiasm which it formerly exerted in the Universities of Britain.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCHES IN SOCIAL REFORM.

WE, the undersigned, profoundly convinced that our churches, as a whole, can only fulfil their mission by taking a collective and organised part in the movements of our time towards the social and moral improvement of the conditions of life, hereby declare our belief:—

(1) That the Christian Church, in addition to the fostering of individual holiness and helpfulness in its members, has a duty to the world at large.

(2) That this duty consists in upholding the ideals of social, national, and international righteousness; in inculcating a spirit of universal brotherhood, and helping to shape its practical embodiment in the institutions and relations of society.

(3) That thus only can it fulfil the obligation laid on it by God to withstand the materialising tendencies of modern civilisation.

(4) That, while all churches have this duty laid upon them, ours, unencumbered as it is by creed and dogma, has also a special call to preach the "good tidings" of God's love for men to the "common people," and that it can never effectively answer this call—nay, cannot be said to have effectively received that gospel itself—unless it is filled with an active sympathy with the growing aspirations of the "common people" towards better conditions of life for all.

(5) That a new consciousness of the grave social implications of our religious faith has recently been forced on the churches by many proofs of their inability to cope with the moral difficulties of an evolving civilisation.

(6) That the Christian Church is put to shame if it is left to others to throw down the challenge of asking what it is doing to guide into a Christian channel the new forces which are at work, and that the time is come, and if not seized may soon be past, for taking spontaneous action in arousing and cultivating in our churches the sense of collective responsibility.

(7) That this responsibility is only to be met by careful and sympathetic study of the social problems of the time, with a view to organised action, on wise lines, on behalf of all movements for uplifting the physical, economic, moral, and spiritual conditions of life.

And therefore we, the undersigned, desire to pledge ourselves, and invite all members of our household of faith, to take up for special consideration in an earnest and sympathetic spirit some one or more of the many difficult questions that confront our generation, to urge their discussion in our religious Press, and to do all in our power to press forward their solution, by combined, as well as individual effort on the part of our own group of Free Churches.

THE last sermon preached by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in Hope-street Church (Nov. 13 last year), is published as this month's number of Sermons for the Day. "Renunciation" is the subject, and it is illustrated by a reference to Ibsen's "Brand."

THE 1906 edition of "Who's Who?" will be published by Messrs. Black on December 8. It will contain fresh particulars by way of still further increasing the utility of the book, and two thousand more biographies than its predecessor. The other year-books published by the same firm, viz., "Who's Who Year-Book," "Englishwoman's Year-Book," and "The Writers' and Artists' Year-Book"—the last-named just acquired by them—will all be published about the same time.

OBITUARY.

MRS. WELLS.

THE congregation at Dunham-road, Altrincham, has sustained another serious loss in the death of Mrs. Wells, widow of the Rev. Geo. Henry Wells. Her maiden name was Mary Wood, and she was a daughter of the late Mr. Joseph Wood, of Rochdale. Her brother, Mr. T. B. Wood, of Middleton, is well known as a steadfast supporter of the congregation there, and our work generally in the Manchester district. Mr. and Mrs. Wells were married in 1863, Mr. Wells having settled at Gorton in 1837. During his long ministry, the character of the neighbourhood and of the congregation underwent great changes. From a little village, reached from Manchester by a country lane, Gorton had become a great centre of industry. The old chapel dated from 1703; a new school was erected in 1863, the year of Mr. Wells's marriage, and was followed eight years later by the building of Brookfield Church, the gift of the late Mr. Richard Peacock, M.P. Under Mr. Wells's ministry, congregation and Sunday-school largely increased. Mrs. Wells was a constant helper of her husband's work, and her labours are still remembered with grateful affection by her old scholars, and by members of the congregation. When Mr. Wells's ministry came to an end in 1881, he and Mrs. Wells, after some months abroad, went to live in Ashley-road, Hale. Mr. Wells died in 1888. Mrs. Wells survived him for seventeen years, and died on Wednesday, November 15, having nearly completed her eighty-third year. Only within the last two years had she shown any signs of failing vigour, and her mind was singularly clear and bright to the end. She was a constant worshipper at Dunham-road Chapel, took a warm interest in its welfare, and was a generous helper of many of our societies and institutions. Cultivated, shrewd, and kindly, she was also very simple and unpretentious in the quiet ordering of her life, and her friends will miss her much. Mrs. Wells leaves one son, Mr. Joseph Wood Wells, of Bournemouth. The interment took place at Brookfield Church, Gorton, on Saturday the 18th, the service being conducted by the Revs. Dendy Agate and George Evans.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has graciously consented to become patron of Bedford College for Women (University of London). Her Majesty's consent was officially announced at the annual general meeting of the members of the College on Friday, November 17. The chairman, the Right Hon. A. H. Dyke Acland also announced that the Parliamentary grant to Bedford College had for the current session been increased from £2,000 to £4,000. This is a welcome recognition of the public value of the work of the College, and a guarantee of the increased efficiency and development of that work. It was reported that past students had already contributed £3,500 to the Building Fund.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HONOUR BEFORE HONOURS.

TOM and Hilda were taken by their aunt over a large High School. It was a dual school, that is, one in which boys and girls work together, not only in junior forms, but right through the school. Aunt Lucy was science mistress in the school. Tom and Hilda were to enter as pupils as soon as the Easter holidays were ended. Rosy-cheeked Tom looked gaily about him, and was in a hurry to see everything and to see it all at once. Pale-faced Hilda, a year and a half his junior, betrayed much interest and a little anxiety. She was not as sure about liking school as Tom was, and only asked one timid question to Tom's boldly uttered half-dozen.

In order to reach the school the children had walked more than two miles in the teeth of a strong wind. The exertion had told on the little delicate girl, but sturdy Tom felt the fresher for it. As the little party of three passed through one of the form rooms, Hilda stopped before a framed illuminated motto which hung on the wall. The motto was "Honour before Honours." Hilda read the words and looked puzzled.

"Aunt Lucy, what does it mean?"

The child looked tired, so she said: "Sit down, and I will explain."

"Oh, Aunt Lucy," cried Tom impatiently, "don't let us stop here. I want to get to the gymnasium."

"In a few minutes, Tom. Honour before Honours means——"

"Oh," cried the boy, with more impatience, "it's no use explaining things to Hilda. She's such a little stupid!"

Aunt Lucy's answering look was bright and quick, and not a bit angry. Yet there was something in it that made the boy feel he had better say no more. Aunt Lucy never let children go too far. Yet she never scolded. She used to say that was the secret. Tom leaned out of the open window, while Aunt Lucy, seating herself beside Hilda, went on again:

"Honour before Honours, when applied to school life, means that girls and boys who wish to get credit or reward for showing ability, or for having been industrious, should be very careful not to try to earn that credit or reward in any way that is not strictly honest or honourable. If a boy or girl is head of a form, or comes out 'top' in an examination, or wins a scholarship, he or she is said to win an honour. The motto teaches that, fine as it is to win honours, the first thing to be considered is, 'Am I trying to win this honour quite fairly, quite honestly? Am I going to take what is not wholly my due?' Last term, when an arithmetic examination paper was being done by the third form, the wind suddenly upset a flower-pot in the window. In the slight confusion that arose, a loose sheet of paper fell from Anna Meaby's desk and dropped at Charlie Tallentire's feet. He picked it up and handed it to Anna. As he did so, his eye fell on a finished sum which was on the paper. It was the very one he was at that moment puzzling himself over. He had stuck in the middle and had not yet been able to see what the next step ought to be; but his half glance, his unintentional half glance, at Anna's plainly written sum, gave him the clue. He could finish his sum now and feel pretty certain that it was correctly worked. But ought he to use the hint he had gained from Anna's paper? He thought to himself that he might have seen what to do independently of Anna if he had had a minute more in which to consider. Then again, Anna's sum might be wrong. But no, Anna's sums were almost always right. Finally he decided to put in the bit he had seen on Anna's paper, but to write on the margin of his own sheet an explanation of what had occurred."

Tom's head was still out of the window, but he had left off fidgetting with his feet and was evidently listening.

"And what happened when Charlie's paper was corrected?" asked Hilda.

"Mr. Donkin gave Charlie half marks for that sum."

"Wasn't it right?" queried Tom.

"Yes, it was right; but judging by what he knew of Charlie's powers and of his usual work, Mr. Donkin had serious doubts whether he really would have seen his own way through the difficulty, so he could not give him full marks. But when the pupils were coming into school two days later, Mr. Donkin passed Charlie on the stairs, and I heard him say: 'Tallentire, I am correcting your arithmetic paper. I see you take Honour before Honours for your guiding rule. You do well. Shake hands.'

"Charlie went into his form room with a happy face, for every pupil here prizes Mr. Donkin's good opinion."

"Did Charlie lose any honour through telling the truth?" asked Hilda.

"Yes, he did lose a small one. The pupils who get 90 or more marks out of a possible 100 given for an examination paper have a star placed against their names on the list, and are said to have passed with honour. On this occasion Charlie only gained 88 marks, so could not get the coveted star."

Hilda looked up eagerly saying, "Tom was like Charlie at Allonby when they had the juvenile sports. He entered for a race in which boys of eight had a longer start than boys of ten. Mr. Bland, who managed the races, thought Tom was only eight, and put him with the eight-year boys. Tom didn't find it out till the last moment when there was no time to alter; so he just dropped out, and nobody noticed. Lottie wanted to tell Mr. Bland and get Tom put on in another race, but he said he didn't want a fuss made, and would not let us tell. It was hard on Tom, for he was a far better runner than the ten-year-old boy who got the second prize. It was a watch. Tom was not even praised, like Charlie, for being honourable. I am rested now, Aunt Lucy, shall we go on?"

As they passed down the broad staircase Tom said, in what was for him a gentle voice, "I'll carry your cloak, Hiddy." His sister looked pleased, for Tom never called her Hiddy unless he meant to be very nice to her. To his aunt he said, humbly, "And I called her a little stupid! Do you know she actually wanted to give me her own watch to make up for not getting the prize?"

Aunt Lucy's smile was warmly approving as she said: "So our little Hilda is generous and forgiving, and Tom, like Charlie, puts Honour before Honours."

RELIGION IN SOCIAL DUTY.

WE have gladly responded to the request that we should publish the declaration and appeal, which will be found in our present issue, on the subject of the duty of our churches in the matter of moral and social reform. The declaration, it will be seen, has received many signatures, and not a few of real weight in the counsels of our religious community. Doubtless many other members of our churches would have been ready to sign, if the opportunity had been given them. Following on the appointment of the Social Questions Committee of the Manchester District Association, this declaration is another welcome indication of the earnest spirit stirring in our churches, out of which should come a new measure of strength and practical endeavour after righteousness.

There are several questions we want to ask as to the exact meaning of the declaration. The subject with which it deals is of vital consequence to religion, and must be faced by the churches. We shall hope to receive from the promoters of this declaration some elucidation of their meaning and some clearer guidance as to what it is they think the members of our churches ought to do. We trust that a really helpful and thorough discussion may be the result.

The central purpose is clear. It is to uphold ideals of social, national, and international righteousness, in the spirit of universal brotherhood, and not only to think and feel about these things, but to do something for the uplifting of the "physical, economic, moral, and spiritual conditions of life." And this specially urgent motive for the appeal is pressed upon our attention. We must make the "common people" feel that we really care for their well-being, and that our religion, as embodied in the churches, is not merely private sentiment, but definitely makes for righteousness, and is a working force on the side of progress and social betterment. This is urged upon us not simply as individual citizens, but as members of churches and collectively; the churches, as such, ought to take an active part in that great warfare for the Kingdom of GOD on earth.

It is at this point that question arises. That there should be careful and sympathetic study of social problems all will agree, and that this is the duty of members of our household of faith, as it is of all good citizens. But what is meant by "taking a collective and organised part in the efforts for social progress," without which, it is declared, our churches cannot fulfil their mission? Does it mean that the churches, as represented in their District Associations and in the National Conference, should take collective action, if not by initiating separate forms of social work, at least by public declarations of principle and policy on questions of social and national well-being, or does it mean that each congregation, as a society of worshippers, should be also an organised force for active social work? It can hardly mean simply that the churches should realise their responsibility, as centres of religious fellowship and inspiration, to send out their members to do the world's work as faithful citizens, and to throw themselves into other organised movements for the public good, in which all willing helpers, whether members of churches or not, are called to take part.

In the fifth of the series of declarations, it is said "that a new consciousness of the grave social implications of our religious faith has recently been forced on the churches by many proofs of their inability to cope with the moral difficulties of an evolving civilisation." May we ask for some illustration of this sentance? In some specific instance of recent moral difficulty, how did the churches (our churches) demonstrate their inability to cope with it? What ought they to have done, that they did not do? Some clear example of past incapacity and unfaithfulness may help to make their duty plainer in the future.

We could have wished that the fourth declaration had been differently worded. It is not so much a special call, as it appears to us, that comes to our churches, as a special opportunity to answer to the call, which is urgent for all churches alike. It should be easier for us, because of our free position, to give a full and ungrudging answer to the call. We ought to be more ready to respond and to enter upon new paths of duty. But have we been even as ready as some others?

With the appeal for more earnest study of social questions we are in the fullest accord, and for their adequate discussion in the religious press. "Organised action, on wise lines, on behalf of all movements for uplifting the physical, economic, moral, and spiritual conditions of life," is what all religious men and women must desire, and be ready to help forward by every means in their power. What we ask of our friends is a clearer declaration as to what the combined effort on the part of our own group of Free Churches ought to be. That a living religious faith must be in close touch with the needs of the people, inspiring to self-sacrifice and loving service, we are deeply convinced. In full response to that call of present duty we believe the regeneration of the churches themselves is to be sought.

PHILOSOPHERS OF THE SPIRIT.

THE appearance of Professor HENRY JONES's address vividly recalls to mind the memorable evening of its delivery in the Library of Manchester College, at the MARTINEAU Centenary Celebration. We had gathered to do honour to our great leader, but the speaker who was to address us was neither a personal disciple of our hero nor an adherent of his school of philosophic thought; and we awaited with the keenest interest, and many of us, perhaps, not without a touch of nervousness, to hear what he would say. We soon learnt that our sense of the piquancy of the situation was fully shared by our lecturer. What splendid confidence, nay, audacity, we had shown in inviting him; and he began by avowing that he felt his own audacity in accepting our invitation to be no less startling.

But there was another trouble. Platitudes as to the greatness of philosophy and the services that MARTINEAU had rendered her would have been unworthy alike of the occasion and the speaker. A broad attempt to make level to the general intelligence the practical outcome and significance of MARTINEAU'S teaching, and produce a kind of "MARTINEAU for Children," such as RICHARD ARMSTRONG could have given us, would only be possible to a thorough-going disciple. A critical estimate remained as the only possible line for the lecturer to follow; and that must inevitably be a technical matter, dealing with terminology moving in regions wherein the uninitiated can never feel quite at home. Dare it be breathed that this difficulty assumes a particularly acute form when the speaker is an ornament of that group of thinkers which (whatever its internal antagonisms may be, and whatever its proper nomenclature) is roughly spoken of by the uninformed as "Hegelian," and is felt to be unapproachable by the unaided intelligence of lay humanity!

Now, the wonderful thing about the meeting was this. All these grounds for apprehension turned out to be more than justified; for one might have grouped under half a dozen heads reasons why the lecture must leave the hearers with a certain sense of dismay; and all these causes of dismay were actually and actively present. And yet, though active, they were not effective, for they were dominated by a force that was greater still. One would have said that there had never been a greater personal triumph than the impression made by Professor JONES's lecture, under these conditions, did one not feel that it was after all something more than a personal triumph, for it was a triumph of the spirit of uncompromising truthfulness, united with the deep sense of kinship of all souls that have felt the breath of inspiration, and the serenity of high purpose.

Perhaps the prevailing feeling on the part of many who could hardly follow, even in outline, the argument of Professor JONES's discourse was that of the wonder and admiration raised by the vivid personality of the lecturer as he stood before us, wrestling with his almost impossible task, flashing and scintillating with spiritual and intellectual energy, launching the rays of his own life and personality out into an intellectually unreceptive but spiritually sympathetic medium, maintaining by sheer personal radiance his hold upon an audience which his matter might have jaded and bewildered had not he himself kept them in hand and sustained an atmosphere of keenest life around them. But what was he really doing all the time? He was doing a wonderful thing. For he was showing us that while the head was busied in finding the penetrable points in an adversary's armour and explaining how his sword would start into shivers as soon as he struck with it, the heart was singing a pæan of praise to a fellow warrior, marching in armour of proof in the ranks of a great and victorious army. And the adversary and the fellow-warrior were one and the same man! It was a magnificent spectacle, and we learnt more from it than any formulæ of philosophy could teach us.

Those of us who had studied MARTINEAU, and even those who had sat under him, had perhaps, as a rule, no great advantage over the rest of Professor JONES's audience, for man learns slowly and forgets quickly; and yet a certain feeling gathered in our minds slowly and half consciously as the orator uttered his burning words. It was the sense that we were learning more sharply to define MARTINEAU's own position than we had ever done before, and to understand how the whole of his philosophy, on its positive and its negative sides alike, was evolved from the direct experiences of the ethical life. The phenomena of conscience meant to him the reality of human choice, and the reality of human choice meant that the human will was a direct and, in a sense, independent origin, not merely a link, an appearance, or a phenomenal by-product of forces other than itself. Any system of psychology, of ethics, of theology, or of metaphysics, which seemed to him to make the personal will a manifestation of something other than itself, failed in the most obvious task of all philosophies, namely, the task of explaining the primal facts of experience. For himself he would explain the universe if he could, but, in any case, he would not allow a hypothesis as to the universe to explain man away. Nay, if driven to the last extreme he seemed rather inclined to let the known limits of human personality invade the deity than to allow the metaphysical conception of the Absolute to absorb man.

As to the rights and wrongs of it all, let the battle of the gods go on! Let Professor UPTON smash in Professor JONES's helmet in revenge for the latter's declaration that Dr. MARTINEAU's sword turned in his hand. But many of us who scarcely aspire to a philosophy of our own at all will gratefully acknowledge that Professor JONES did for us (though he did it indirectly) the exact thing he ought to have done and was there to do; for he beat out into clearer and surer relief our sense of the exact thing that MARTINEAU stood for, the truths which he would not let go, and which we have a right to demand shall be reckoned with, and reckoned with at their full value, in any philosophical solution of the problems of the universe.

To these impressions one more must be added. Those of us who remembered the days when Professor BAIN was thought almost to have uttered the last word on speculative philosophy, realised that night how completely the battlefield had shifted. The very direction of the present attack on MARTINEAU'S philosophy proclaimed to us the completeness of its victory on the main line of conflict. As far as anything that we heard that night went, materialism as a philosophy might no longer be in the field. Professor JONES was not reviving the battle that we had fought under MARTINEAU'S flag, but was discussing with deepest earnestness what should be done with the victory.

Hence, though some of us may have felt that, after all, MARTINEAU'S significance as a philosophical thinker had, directly, been somewhat unduly disparaged, yet we felt that indirectly it had been nobly vindicated. The enthusiastic appreciation of MARTINEAU'S power as a spiritual teacher with which Professor JONES concluded his address was no mere attempt to fulfil, as best he might, the role of panegyrist, which it might have been thought officially incumbent on him to assume, but was a deep and sincere confession of oneness with MARTINEAU in the things which underlie all true philosophy, and which are as often confined and dwarfed, as embodied and developed in the formulæ of intellectual creeds.

P. H. W.

ANATHEMA AND FAITH.*

BY THE REV. J. E. ROBERTY, OF PARIS.

"And there shall be no longer any anathema" ("There shall be no curse any more," R.V.).—Rev. xxii. 3.

BROTHERS and sisters, honoured masters and colleagues in the study and ministry of the Spirit, grace and peace be unto you from God, our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

We are met together in this church, on the eve of the official opening of the Third International Congress of Liberal and Progressive Christians, for conjoint prayer and edification.

Before entering upon a mutual interchange of experiences, we find ourselves welcomed in the bosom of the Church of Geneva, at the heart of the Reformation in French-speaking countries, in one of its most inspiring sanctuaries, and many of us thrill with gratitude to God; and for my part I would far rather kneel and worship than speak.

It was here that, on May 21, 1536, the people of Geneva shattered the bond that once attached them to Roman Christianity, and, once again, more concerned for practical reform than for intellectual freedom, swore to accept the Gospel as the rule of their life, as they had sworn to accept it as the sole rule of their beliefs. It was here that, on June 5, 1557, in the presence of all the citizens, was founded the Institution which was to give birth to the Academy of Geneva, and of which the first rector was to be Theodore Beza. The principal object, no doubt, of this Institution was to prepare ministers of the Holy Gospel; but by the breadth and diversity of its projects it was already making evident that the intrinsic genius of the Reformation intended to associate learning with piety, lay enlightenment with religious enlightenment, and aimed at producing pastors who should be abreast of the general culture of their times. Here, too, thousands of Christians, driven out of France and Italy, persecuted for their faith, found a refuge, and raised on high their cry of deliverance. It was in this church that the national life and the government of a free people sought to renew themselves at the fountain of true strength, inspired, in those days, by this idea—and it was an idea by no means so wild as people are apt to think it now—that the State as well as the individual is bound to refer to Jesus Christ as its standard. It was from this pulpit that the voice of Calvin thundered terrific words of anathema, but words that nevertheless glowed with a flame of liberty so bright—the liberty of Christ!—that it was destined to consume gradually the dogmatism bequeathed from past ages, and to call into existence, in the very bosom of one of the most exclusive of churches, the hospitable and fraternal church which to-day is welcoming heretics arriving from all parts of the globe.

What an innovation! And, in the eyes of the faithful, what a triumph of the

* A sermon preached on Aug. 28 in the Church of St. Peter, in Geneva, at the inauguration of the Third International Congress of Liberal and Progressive Christianity (The Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers). Translated by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A.

Spirit! What a rebuff to all human calculations!

And, when I muse on all this past of glory and bloodshed, on those barriers of religious thought destroyed one after another by the influence of the genuine Gospel of Christ, when I think of those who were persecuted and of those who were their persecutors, gathered now and united in the life of the Divine Light, and now inspiring by their mysterious intimations the efforts of the Church militant, how can I fail to be struck by the mighty workings of the Spirit of God in the midst of human passions and errors, and by that progressive education of men, who but yesterday were breathing out slaughters, and to-day are united in a closer communion with the truth. And we who believe—assuredly I do—in the communion of the living and the dead, we who think that at this very hour, in this very place, the cloud of witnesses for Christ encompass us about, shall we fail to call them to our side, to fortify us in the execution of the special task which God has given us to do?

O ye who in a thousand different ways suffered for the truth, who set it above all worldly allurements, and who now gaze upon it more closely; ye who feel how your errors and the injustice of your struggles are vanishing away before the ardour of the grace of God; ye who behold us assembled here, with our troubles, and our stumbling faith; ye who now can read our very hearts,—O spirits of Calvin, Farel, Castellion, of Theodore Beza and of Michael Servetus, breathe into our hearts a message from the Eternal God! Shall I be thought to be labouring under a delusion, shall I be set down as a mere visionary, if I declare that in response to our cry, the word of the Apocalypse, even now, shines resplendent from those walls, and from the pillars of this cathedral, written for every man in his own language, and that we can all read with our own eyes this sublime prophecy: "And there shall be no longer any anathema"?

But, O just and loving God, can it be? Yes, we do indeed read it. It is no illusion. It is actually written. If you lack faith to decipher the divine writing on the wall, take this holy book which is pondered over in this church every Sunday, and read! There was once a believer who was sometimes, however, a prey to fulgurant fanatical visions, who yet traced with his pen the letters of my text, condemning fanaticism, and imparting a thrill of joy to free believers for all time!

I.

But will this prophecy ever be fulfilled? Ah! no doubt at the end of time, in the New Jerusalem, or, as people say nowadays, in the future City, when there shall be no more individual sin, nor social wickedness, when the knowledge of God will fill the minds of men as the light fills the noonday air, when, in the thought of the Seer, whose words we are now considering, "no temple will be seen therein." Ah! then no doubt there will no longer be any anathema. That is conceivable enough. There will be no longer an anathema, because the will of God will be known of all, and because there will be no longer any one or anything to be anathematised. The situation will have become extremely simple.

But if our hearts thrill with joy at the reading of these words, it certainly is not merely because of that future state which it foretells, and in which we believe, but it is because we consider it as already applicable in the order of doctrine; it is because this revelation of God forms part of our most cherished convictions, and because many churches have already realised it, and because all our efforts are tending to make it henceforth valid.

But, here, let us confess our grounds for anxiety. Does not the application of this divine principle, my brethren, sometimes give you occasion for concern? We glory in proclaiming aloud: "Amongst us, amongst our religious groups, the anathema is unknown, that is to say, no one can be cut off from communion with the faithful nor from communion with God for any doctrinal cause," and we are, beyond all question, right. But, on the other hand, we have no intention of lapsing into doctrinal indifferentism; we hold that there are detestable and demoralising doctrines. We do not think that error is merely a less valuable form of truth, a sort of bronze medal compared with a gold medal. We aspire to keep intact all the might of faith. Nor does our "liberalism" consist in believing only the fifth part of what our fathers believed. If that indeed were "liberalism," it would be equivalent to a failure, and not, as I believe it is, a victory of faith; nay, more, a triumph of faith over sight, of the spirit over the flesh. Now, if this is the case—and I think I am but expressing your views, and it is no mere pastor addressing you now, but the religious consciousness of this Assembly in communion with the Spirit of God and with all united believers—if such is the case, I repeat, how can we avoid excluding some, or refrain from sometimes pronouncing an anathema?

Are we not confronted with a well-nigh insurmountable obstacle?

We are, as it were, caught in a kind of fantastic mountain pass. On the one hand rises a sheer perpendicular wall; on the other is the abrupt descent of an abyss. There is just room enough to pass, and before us stands the Obstacle, like a monster which we must either slay, or which will cast us headlong into the yawning gulf.

How then are we to annihilate this spirit of anathema and retain the vigour of faith?

Such is the problem which claims our most assiduous thought, and demands a persevering spirit of prayer, a solution for which must be found, if we are anxious that our militant efforts should not be paralysed by a fatal contradiction.

II.

To help us to solve the problem, we have at our service the wisdom of theology and philosophy. We are bidden enter upon a criticism of human knowledge; we are urged to study the history of dogmas, to take account of the relative character of all expressions of faith. We are asked to distinguish between the faith that is a practical, organic need, analogous to hunger and thirst, and the faith that is a mere set of beliefs, little better than opinions, and always susceptible of modification and conditioned by the state of the general culture at any given epoch. We are invited to observe that there is not a church, not a religious association, be its title what it may, that has not, at some time or another anathematised its neighbour, and we are to note that all these anathemas are mutually destructive, and defeat the pretension of the human mind to express the Absolute. Nay, more, we are directed to the teaching of the greatest of religious leaders, Jesus of Nazareth, and to the nature of the primitive Gospel, with its anti-dogmatic, anti-intellectual trend, and its insistence above all upon the moral character of the individual, upon rectitude of will, and the practical goodness of actions. Ignorance, therefore, is the parent of anathema; knowledge alone can vanquish this formidable adversary.

The wisdom of theology and philosophy cannot be gainsayed. It offers golden counsel, worthy of all honour. All honour to the theologians, philosophers, critics, historians, who, perilling their tranquillity and reputation, and rejected by their brethren as suspects or as infidels, have contributed by their labours, and by their disinterested love of truth, to liberate religion from clerical authority on the one hand, and from fanaticism and the pride of ignorance on the other, and who have exhibited religion before the eyes of all the world, especially in their own lives, as compounded entirely of love and patience, justice, humility, and peace. All honour to those who, holding the highest functions in the church of their childhood and their youth, and swaying at will whole multitudes under the mighty yoke of their eloquence, have voluntarily left their pulpits, divinely upright and without blemish in motive, rather than continue to teach facts contrary to truth and history, and who henceforth pursue a solitary career, accompanied, however, by that special grace of the Gospel of the Spirit which has enabled them to pass uninjured through the fiery furnaces, and to tread on serpents and be unhurt. Yes, the science of religion, at the hands of conscientious men has produced marvellous results, and narrowed the limits of the empire of anathema.

But to whom does all this appeal? Surely only to the élite, or we ought rather to say, only to the exceptional. Has everybody the time to learn and to devote to these special studies? Nay, has everybody the mental training adapted for assimilating even the mere results? Surely not. Thus the great mass of people are to continue to suffer from the anathematising spirit, whilst a select few, attached to the highest religious culture, and near the living sources, dwell apart in mutual benevolence? Is such a thing tolerable? Is it even human? Surely not.

And then, supposing that science and philosophy alone succeeded in vanquishing the spirit of anathema, would it succeed in preserving, at the same time, faith, an ardent, passionate faith in every soul? The scientific spirit is a spirit of reserve, of investigation, of distrust, of analysis, whilst the religious spirit is characterised by qualities of confidence, boldness, and affirmation. Psychologically they are mutually exclusive. How can you expect the former to support the latter? How can we fail to be impressed by the spectacle of so many social groups wherein the scientific spirit—rightly or wrongly apprehended, it matters little, the result is the same—has extinguished the religious spirit? For my part, if I were required absolutely to choose between the two, I should not hesitate a moment, and should prefer faith, with all its possibilities of anathema, to the spiritual lukewarmness we encounter in our cultured circles. Lukewarmness! High-class indifference! Ah! let us leave these things to the men of the world, and to the churches of the world! As for us, if we succeed in getting rid of the anathematising spirit, we none the less aspire to keep our faith intact, that it may be a force in social life. Science alone is inadequate to perform such a miracle.

III.

Then, in the next place, some of the most eminent representatives of Protestant individualism come to us and say, the solution which you are in search of is pre-eminently one of a practical order. To get rid of the anathema and preserve faith, each believer must just group himself with others who are of his own way of thinking. When you cannot agree on a question of doctrines, there is no need to water them down, still less is there any need to condemn each other; all you need to do is to separate. You can still remain good friends. No other church is practically possible, if it is to maintain its freedom, than the local church, the particular community, the "congregation." Little groups of persons united by the same beliefs are necessary constituents in the formation of the Kingdom of God. A salutary spirit of emulation, moreover, animating faith and producing good works, would be an inevitable result. And then, from time to time, on certain solemn and rare occasions, there may take place a general reunion, when all conjointly may glorify God.

This solution possesses some great advantages, and, at the point we have now arrived in the evolution of religious thought, seems even inevitable. And it is an eminently Protestant solution. But how comes it that it incites us to no eager adhesion, but rather excites in many of us an insuperable repugnance? Does it not strike you as conceding too much to human weakness, and as singularly calculated to degrade our loftiest ideal?

I will confine myself to two observations.

We are neither politicians nor materialists. We do not hold with the view that racial and international hatred is indispensable to human progress. We believe in the fundamental unity of the human family, we preach a gospel of brotherhood and love, and is it possible that, just at that moment when we perceive our union before the God of that gospel, we must straightway split up into sections? We may not pray in common, nor participate in common in that very Supper of the Lord which was instituted to symbolise love and the divine power of love! Children though we be of the self-same family, yet we may not sit at the same table!

Alas! how are we to escape from such an odious contradiction?

You may remind me that Protestant individualism ecclesiastically stimulates the activity of its adherents. That is, no doubt, true. But it fosters a spirit diametrically opposed to the Spirit of Christ, and far more conducive to envy, jealousy, and pride in the religious world than in the economic world, and, we make bold to say, it fosters the pestilential spirit of competition. The Gospel and the competitive spirit! It is too ludicrous for words!

We vie as to who shall have the most crowded church, the most popular preacher, the most attractive choir. All the popular methods of worldly advertisement are daily practised by the followers of Christ and the prophets! Above all things we must succeed; we must have our churches filled. The so-called prosperous church is by no means obviously the most faithful to the ideals of the Gospel, by no means the most humble and devout; but either it is the best drilled, or the most managing, or the most wealthy. Polished manners, tricks of behaviour, the social standing of members, insinuating ways, these are the things that are elevated into cardinal virtues. Above all things, cultivate a genius for advertisement, or die.

Oh! how can we consent—unless driven thereto by the anathemas of the churches of authority—how can we consent to such a solitary triumph of our own sect; how consent to have a church merely for ourselves and our friends, while, all the time, the words of the Master are ringing in our ears: "And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock, one Shepherd."

The solution offered by science is incomplete; it is too aristocratic. The solution proposed by Protestant individualism is precarious, and at the best a make-shift. Is this the end of all our efforts to extinguish the spirit of anathema, and to keep alive the spirit of faith? Is there no other solution? Let me at least endeavour to indicate another.

IV.

And at the outset I will ask you a question, which will place us at once on the solid ground of religion.

Do you believe in the mystery of personality? Do you hold that, away down below words and acts, and deep down at the very source, as it were, of ideas, in any given person, there is an irreducible, inco-ordinable element, which we call precisely a person, and which gives to acts, words, ideas their value and their character? Perhaps you will say: "A person is only known by his words and his acts, and these reveal him; the rest escapes us." That is only partly true, inasmuch as the self-same acts done by another individual, under identically the same conditions, create a very different impression; and inasmuch as one given personality, whatever he might do or say, would never succeed in becoming a centre of attraction, or in producing an atmosphere of sympathy around himself; whereas another succeeds in so doing by a single word, or even by his very presence. Does the same word uttered by Buddha, Isaiah, or Jesus send forth the same sound or possess the same virtue? The experience of mankind is at hand to furnish a reply, and it tells us, moreover, that there is another mode of perception than that by means of the senses and of "the reason"; there are certain spontaneous operations of faith and of love which of themselves directly lead us to the central mystery which resides in the very being of each personality.

Well now, religious truth, and more especially Christian truth—and this is our means of escape—resides in the mystery of personality. Scientific truth is found in the facts of the senses, speaking generally; philosophic truth is found in the realm of ideas, religious truth inheres in a person, attaching not to what he says or does, but to what he is, to his intrinsic worth, to the manner of his inner life, to the manner in which he experiences the influences of that ineffable power which we call God or the Spirit, and which operates in the deep places of human consciousness.

But how can we think of the intrinsic worth of personality in religion without thinking at the very outset of Jesus and of his Gospel? If you know of a personality which surpasses his, then chose it, love it, abide in it, and let it abide in you! For my part, I speak to you of him who is my only Master and my only Saviour. Now I would have you observe, brethren, that if the Gospel is something different from Christ himself, if it can be detached from him like the doctrine of Confucius or of Mahomet, if, without changing its nature, it can become a "law," a teaching in the strict sense of the word, so that it can be called the doctrine of the Redemption, or "Paternal Theism," or the "Religion of Goodness," then we shall find ourselves falling headlong into the abyss which we lately spoke of; the monster triumphs; Christians are henceforth doomed to the iniquities and to the shame of the anathematising spirit; they will feel constrained to exclude from fraternal communion, and from communion with God, all those who do not accept the teaching of the Master in its integrity; or, it may be, and this will be another alternative, the practice of this teaching, by our defective wisdom and our bourgeois morality, will create a state of soul so mediocre and so impotent that, verily, faith and its holy excesses would forsake us, to find shelter in the heart of some atheistic revolutionist who can sacrifice himself for his brothers; or in the heart of some poor monk praying in his cell, and who knows what renunciation means; or in the heart of some illiterate narrow-minded woman, who, craving to be victorious in the trials of her life, can do nothing but repeat without ceasing, "I believe on Jesus Christ! I believe on Jesus Christ!"

But, thank God, the Gospel does not move primarily in a realm of ideas and of theoretic teaching. Jesus brings no new doctrine about God and salvation and the future life—for what did he teach that the prophets had not taught before him?—nor any exposition of moral problems which must be implicitly accepted by a true follower. No, he willed to make humanity whole; it is salvation, it is "life" he brings to his disciples. But how? By what means? By exacting conformity with his thoughts, so that Jesus might be no better than a superior scribe or pope, by subjection to his will, so that we should find in him a new Moses, a great lawgiver and judge? Oh! no; but by communion in spirit with him, by our contact with the mystery of his personality. "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Confess me before men; love me more than father or mother; follow me; will ye not come unto me to obtain life!" And these two other sayings help us to penetrate still deeper into the mystery of his soul: "Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of Man shall be forgiven." "He that believeth in me, believeth not in me, but in him that sent me."

And then, when I come near to him, when I gaze into that depth of holiness and love, I am no longer in the presence of a book, of a text, of an idea, of an institution, of a rule, but I am in the presence of a light to which I can give no other name than that of God in man. I seem to see within that light the heart of God and the heart of humanity indissolubly united. The secret of this individuality of Jesus acts upon me like a radiant heat, like the sun on the darkest clouds. All that is within me, injustice, selfishness, impurity, cowardice, feels at once this searching flame. Pain, anguish, humiliation, shameful failures, all my crosses, I needs must bear, that the renewing of my miserable self, for which I now crave with all my might, may operate within me; I feel my deliverance at hand, and my faith increasing in my heart. Why tell me of a world of intellectual phenomena, and of a sacred metaphysic, and of the anathema it carries within it? All this has vanished from my horizon, and is as alien to me as the stones of the wayside. Why tell me of interests of parties or of churches, of the "claims of God," or of truth, phrases that are the great originators and purveyors of anathemas and of massacres? I can no longer comprehend you, I can no longer grasp your meaning. Why bid me be wise for myself and run no risks? Christ is my life, and it is for him and with him that I crave to fight and die. Deadly influences, it is true, have their traces still in my soul, in my church, in human society; but I tell you Christ is the Light and the Life, and that he sheds light and life in abundance upon those who seek him as one seeks God, as one seeks the Holy Spirit! He does not dissolve the might of faith and of love; he is the life. To vanquish human ignominies he launched no anathemas, he sought no other way than letting his life stream richly through the veins of a lost humanity.

Such then is my solution of the problem. It is old; it is, moreover, a child's solution. It is communion with Jesus Christ. Think what you will; do what you will; but do not lose touch with his personality. The generations to come would never forgive you, and the future of free Christianity would be blighted. That future depends on your inner attitude to Jesus Christ.

To the prophet Isaiah, troubled for the fate of his people, and asking the watchman: "Watchman, what of the night?" The watchman answers: "The morning cometh, and also the night." An obscure saying, and yet true. Yes, if you neglect the personal communion with Jesus, if you reduce individual and social salvation to a philosophical doctrine which can be learnt by heart like a doctrine of Kant or of Spinoza, you forsake the domain of religion, you endanger the life of the churches, you perpetuate the anathematising spirit, you enfeeble the life of faith—the night cometh. But if you will solemnly accustom yourselves, in your family life and in the life of your churches, to the practice of communion with the Crucified, if you manifest the divine influence of his soul in your character and in your actions, a fresh and radiant morning will appear, when there shall no longer be any anathema, and when faith shall be resplendent as the dawn; yes, if you will, the morning also cometh. Amen.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IRELAND.

YOUR columns contained a very fair and full notice of the paper which was read in June last, at a specially called meeting of our Irish Association of Churches. The paper, by a valued member of the congregation of All Souls, Belfast, took an hour to read and is thirty pages long in pamphlet form; it bristles with points of controversy and of challenge; and it urges a far-reaching scheme of church reform and reconstruction. It was not to be expected, therefore, that the gentlemen who were told off to speak about it at the meeting should do more than cordially thank Dr. Campbell for his paper, and promise that it should receive very earnest consideration. The time was not yet come when its detailed and practical meaning could be grasped, and we should need to think it well over before we could estimate the value of its suggestions or even test the correctness of its statements or judge of the justice of its tone. There is a committee appointed to represent our various presbyteries and our non-presbyterial congregations, sitting upon the matter at this present time, and in due course, doubtless, they will give our congregations and ministers something to consider and something to reply to. Organisation schemes have a sad way of running to waste among us. Is it to be so with this also? We shall see.

But although I am quite willing, for my own part, to wait for our committee's report on the practical measures suggested in the paper, and judge nothing before the time, I may still permit myself to say that there was a good deal in the paper itself that jarred upon some of those who listened to it, or at least upon one of them. It is never very difficult to get a meeting of Unitarians to bewail our general want of success, our coldness, our fewness, and how badly we compare with more energetic and more sympathetic churches round about us. And no one can say that there is not very good reason and plenty of room for improvement among us. But there may be question, nevertheless, whether we do not at times let this temper of self-abasement rather run away with us, and carry us over into unfairness towards our own cause and towards our own men. For certain reasons which I might give, I can leave myself out of account in this matter, and think and speak of it as it concerns others. And when I put the question whether Dr. Campbell's account of our work and our workers here is, on the whole, correct; whether the impression which his paper must produce is just; whether we are in the broken and hopeless condition which is told of; then I am bound to say that I believe the picture that is here presented is done in far too sombre colours, and however many and however great our faults and needs may be, there is more spiritual life among us, more work, more faithfulness, more hopefulness than is here allowed for. There are women and there are men among our laity who are doing splendid service, and there are ministers who are justly "esteemed very highly in love for their work's sake." I do not want to cocker our people up with the notion that they are rich and have need of nothing. I wish with all my heart they were readier to help with the steady plodding work of our churches and schools and societies and missions. It is hard to resist the downward drag of discouragement. And all the time there is the special difficulty which the peculiar melancholy of the "Celtic genius" throws in the way of a hopeful and eager faith, a certain want of buoyancy and of the patience that has grip and staying power in it, the tear in Erin's eye, the minor key in which we pipe to our weeping skies. It is hard work at times, especially in Ireland, to keep one's heart up and preach a Gospel of courage and cheer. But even at the worst I do not believe that Dr. Campbell's paper gives at all a true account of the condition and prospects of Liberal Religion in Ireland, or tells what we are really making of the great purpose for which churches exist and ministers are appointed.

Here are some of Dr. Campbell's words: "Lamentable stagnation," "apathy of the laity," "they have left their own church literally to starvation," "of no service to a young man who has to push his fortune," the supply of Irish ministers has "virtually ceased for the past twenty-five years," our ministers give their people "a polished religious or theological discourse," but "fail to dwell" on essentials of Gospel teaching.

With all due acknowledgment of Dr. Campbell's earnestness and goodwill to the cause, may I venture to suggest, nevertheless, that this is overdone? It is one-sided. There's a better and a brighter side to think of. There are men hard at work among us whose purposes, whose labour, whose teaching, life and influence deserve some better recognition than they here receive. "No outstanding personality," says Dr. Campbell, among our ministers. Whatever that wonderful word may mean, there are men among us who are doing their very utmost to preach and work and live as messengers of God's saving grace to men. Must they wait till they are dead before we give them a civil word even? At this moment we are all heartsore for the death of Richard Lyttle, and all the north of Ireland has been paying him the honour due to a true-hearted, earnest, faithful man; a man whom everybody esteemed and everybody loved; who won the trust of a whole countryside; in whose work and character there was something of the heroic. Are we to forget such an asset as Lyttle, and send in our bankrupt account with "nil" to credit?

Then, again, if any one has gathered from the paper that we have no Irish students for the minstry, it will surprise him to learn that at this moment there are no fewer than six young Irishmen in training for ministerial service among us. One is a graduate student at Manchester College, Oxford; three are at the Home Missionary College; one, younger, is at the Belfast Academical Institution; and one, less advanced, is working with a tutor. Six students from about thirty-six churches. Keep the same proportion for our churches across the water, and how many students should we have on our books? Ireland is at least doing its share of the work of growing young men for our ministry. May I not again suggest that judgment here has been a little hasty, and that present-day conditions have had too little power to modify the terms of an omnibus indictment?

I must leave it to others to answer the complaint that our men do not preach certain Gospel truths. I have put myself out of the present reckoning, and what my brethren in the ministry teach and preach I do not exactly know. I do not hear more than two or three sermons a year from our own men, and even these are generally on special occasions and of a special character. But I meet my brethren continually in conference and for common work; I know something of the spirit and faith that are in them; and I simply do not believe that the old gibe about the "theological essay" in any way touches them.

As to what is still needed to make our work more effective, our present and possible methods of organisation, it will be time enough to speak of that when our joint committee has given us its report.

DOUGLAS WALMSLEY.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

Manchester: Bradford.—The following appeal for a piano, needed for Children's Sunday Evening Services at the Mill street Free Church, we have received from the President of the Manchester District Association and the Minister of the church:—"The additional premises, opened last November (and not yet quite paid for) have afforded opportunities for new developments. Among them is one which has a particularly important bearing on the religious life of the district, and the building up of the church. We refer to the establishment of a Children's Service, held in the Lecture Hall, from 6.30 to 7.30 on Sunday evenings, at the same time as the service for the congregation. We are sure that this endeavour to accustom the children to attend religious services specially adapted for them will commend itself to your readers. Since the beginning of these services on the first Sunday in October, the attendance has ranged from 120 to nearly 200, and on some occasions more would have come in, had the room been larger. A choir numbering forty has been formed, who attend a week-night practice. There is no reason why the services should not be held always through the winter months, and perhaps longer still. But we need a piano; one is on hire for this quarter, but we should be thankful to possess one of our own. It would be of great use, not only on Sundays, but at other times as well. If, through your kind insertion of this appeal, any of your readers are disposed to help, their contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by Dendy Agate, The Parsonage, Dunham-road, Altrincham; W. E. Atack (resident Minister), 44, Seymour-road South, Clayton, Manchester."

Blackburn.—The committee that has in hand the formation of a Unitarian congregation in Blackburn has engaged the Exchange Hall, and services will begin on Sunday evening, the 26th. The secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, takes the first service, and will deal with "The Religious Message of Unitarianism." He will be succeeded the following Sunday evening by the Rev. R. M'Gee, of Blackpool, formerly a well-known Congregational minister in that district, and on December 10 and 17 by Rev. Charles Travers, of Preston, and Rev. J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley. Twenty Sunday evenings are being arranged for in this way.

Bury St. Edmunds.—Last Sunday afternoon the Rev. Frederic Allen addressed the Young Men's Christian Association in the Town Hall on "The Hieroglyphs of God." About 130 members were present, and the singing of the hymns was led by a string band. Hearty thanks were given to Mr. Allen for his address

Hindley.—A unique event was celebrated at the Presbyterian Chapel on Saturday, November 18, in the diamond wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Unsworth. Originally belonging to Astley, they have for almost forty years been devoted members of the Hindley congregation, Mr. Unsworth serving for several years as secretary of the chapel, and as teacher in the school. A wide circle of friends will be interested to hear of the event, as Mr. Unsworth has long been a genial presence at the various Unitarian gatherings in Lancashire and Cheshire. He has acted for many years as delegate to the meetings of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission and to the Provincial Assembly, and has kept up to beyond his eightieth year, the good old custom of visiting neighbouring congregations for miles round on the occasion of their Sunday-school anniversaries. A large company of descendants (4 surviving daughters, 37 grandchildren, and 17 great grandchildren), relatives and friends united to celebrate the event. When after tea a social gathering was held, the Rev. John Moore, on behalf of the congregation, presented an affectionate address to the venerable couple.

Kilmarnock.—Special services were held in Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church on Sunday last on the occasion of the visit of the Rev. Alex. Webster, of Aberdeen, formerly minister here. He preached to augmented congregations, especially in the evening, when there would be 250 people present, and when an orchestra from the theatre played several pieces and accompanied the hymns.

Liscard.—The Bazaar held on November 9, 10 and 11, to which we referred last week, was opened on the first day by Mr. F. W. Monks, of Warrington, in the absence of the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who had been announced, but was prevented by indisposition from taking the journey. On the second day Mr. W. B. Bowring was the opener, and on the third day Mr. Charles W. Jones. The gross receipts amounted to £421 19s. 2d.; donations from friends, £201 2s.; and from members of the congregation, £71 16s. Expenses amounted to £133 16s. 7d. The net result of over £561 does not include £130 previously raised towards the Independence Fund. The bazaar aimed at £460, so that the congregation is to be warmly congratulated on the success of the effort.

London: Little Portland-street.—We are informed that the congregations at this almost deserted chapel, where the Rev. J. Page Hopps is now regularly preaching, have very greatly improved. The morning congregation has more than doubled, and last Sunday evening the congregation nearly filled the body of the chapel. This is all the more hopeful because the greatest difficulty was felt in gathering an evening congregation.

London: Wandsworth.—On Thursday evening, the 16th inst., the Elmsleigh Social and Literary Union, in connection with the Wandsworth congregation, received a visit from the Laymen's Club. The members of the club were received by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, supported by a large attendance of the members of the Union. After social intercourse, Mr. Tarrant took the chair, and extended a hearty welcome to Mr. H. B. Lawford, president, and the other members of the club. Mr. Lawford, in a humorous speech, thanked the members of the union for the kindness and warmth of their reception. Dr. C. Herbert Smith then expounded at some length the scheme for sending ministers to Boston in 1907 (vide INQUIRER, Nov. 11), and short speeches followed from Mr. H. Wade, vice-president and treasurer, Rev. W. L. Tucker, of Stamford-street, and Mr. R. M. Montgomery. A short musical programme followed, given by the members of the club. Representatives attended from Highgate, Brixton, Hampstead, Islington, Hackney, and Wandsworth. As a result of Dr. Smith's appeal, a committee was formed at Wandsworth to promote the scheme.

Middlesbrough.—At the close of the service on Sunday evening the Rev. W. H. Lambelle asked the members of the congregation present to join with him in expressing their indignation at the horrible massacre perpetrated in Russia, especially the persecution of the Jews in that country. Mr. T. F. Ward, Mr. J. Smith, J.P., and Councillor Kedward moved and supported the resolution.

Newport, Mon.—The movement which started here with such promise seven weeks ago received a fresh impetus last Sunday, when the Rev. James Harwood paid a special visit. There was a crowded congregation in the evening. In an impressive discourse Mr. Harwood emphasised the duty of fearlessly examining our beliefs in the light of reason and conscience, and, although disturbing doubts might follow, and lead to the abandonment of previously accepted views, the ultimate gain would be the attainment of a higher and stronger faith than that which was lost. After the service Mr. Harwood met the members of the congregation and the committee, and gave much encouraging advice for future work. On Nov. 26 and Dec. 3 the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., will conduct the services, and deliver a lecture on Nov. 30. The Newport congregation are extremely fortunate in having arranged to lease a place of worship which will shortly be vacated by another denomination. They hope to be in possession of their new home by the end of December, and look forward to increased membership resulting.

Nottage.—A grievous loss has befallen the Rev. W. J. Phillips, in the death, on November 14, of his second son, Evan Ewart, a little lad of 7½ years, as the result of a distressing accident. Much sympathy was manifested at the funeral on the 17th, at Newton, where Mr. Phillips resides. A short service was held at the house and at the grave in the parish churchyard, at one or other of which the following ministers took part:—J. Hathren Davies, D. Evans (C.), David G. Rees, E. Pearce (C.M.), R. J. Jones, David G. Evans, and B. C. Davies (B.).

Nottingham: High Pavement.—The Musical Recital, to which we referred in a front page note last week, was duly given by Mr. Ellenberger and his friends on Monday evening. There was a very large attendance, estimated at about 400, and the music was greatly enjoyed. The next recital is to be on December 18. A meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society was held at the schools on Tuesday evening, November 21, when the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Loughborough, gave a lantern lecture on "Our Old Lancashire Churches." In a very interesting discourse Mr. Burgess traced the history of these churches, and of early nonconformity in the district. The President of the Society (Mr. J. C. Warren) occupied the chair, and at the close of the lecture a very hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Burgess on the motion of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, seconded by Mr. F. Robinson.

Pentre and Clydach Vale, S. Wales (Resignation).—The Rev. D. Rhoslwyn Davies has resigned the pastorates of these churches, and will terminate his ministry there at the end of the year.

Todmorden.—On Tuesday last Mr. John Harwood gave an excellent miscellaneous Recital in the school. A large audience gathered to hear him, and was amply rewarded by his humour and his dramatic power. In mirthfulness and pathetic power alike Mr. Harwood showed mastery of his art, and his visit will be long remembered.

MARTINEAU MEMORIAL FUND, NORWICH.

THE Committee of the Octagon Chapel gratefully acknowledge the subjoined contributions paid or promised since the publication of the list of donors in May last. Nearly £2,000 are still wanting to complete the required sum, and further promises and gifts are therefore earnestly appealed for, and should be sent to Mrs. F. A. Mottram, hon. secretary to the Fund, The Birches, Bracondale, Norwich, who will gladly and promptly acknowledge them.

JUBILEE MEMORIAL FUND.

£20,000

For the Purchase, Equipment and Endowment of the Residential Collegiate Buildings, Summerville, Victoria Park.

SPECIAL APPEAL TO UNITARIANS IN LONDON AND DISTRICT.

THE following list includes new and increased donations received since the last announcement, as well as a selection from former lists. It is published now to show the support which the Fund has met with in London and District, and in the hope that it may encourage others to contribute. While the Jubilee Committee cordially appreciate the great generosity of many London Unitarians, as shown in this list, they cannot but feel that London Unitarians, as a whole, have hardly realised the claims which the College makes upon them as a national institution. The College is established in Manchester, but its students come to it from all parts, and leave it, as the Current Year Book shows, to occupy pulpits in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and other parts of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. There are many and obvious reasons why the College should be established in Manchester, especially since the creation there of the first Faculty of Theology which both teaches and examines without reference to sectarian limitations; but the College remains national in its sympathies, services, and aims. The Committee will be glad to send deputations to address congregational meetings in London and District to explain their work more in detail. Meanwhile they urgently appeal for new or (where possible) increased donations from all friends in the London District.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach on six Sunday evenings, at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, beginning on Sunday week, December 10. These will include Christmas Eve, New Year's Eve, and the first two Sundays of the New Year. The service, which begins at half-past six, will be conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, minister of the chapel.

At Mansford-street Mission, Bethnal Green, the new club rooms are to be opened on Tuesday evening with a public meeting, over which Mr. Charles W. Jones, of Liverpool, will preside. The building has now a handsome front in Blythe-street as well as Mansford-street, and the work of this mission, under the superintendence of the Rev. Gordon Cooper, is making admirable progress. We trust that a large gathering of friends will take part in Tuesday's celebration, and that this work in Bethnal Green will be amply sustained.

LAST year we had the satisfaction of stating that all the copies of THE INQUIRER sent to free libraries in different parts of the country were paid for by generous friends. This year, we regret to say, that has by no means been the case. Only eighteen copies have as yet been paid for, and more than twice that number remain a charge upon our funds. If there are friends who would still be willing to meet that cost and to continue their kindness for the coming year we should be very grateful.

LAST Sunday the first of a series of afternoon addresses on subjects connected with social reform was given in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester. The Lord Mayor, Councillor Thewlis, presided, and Mr. Philip Snowden spoke on the causes and remedies for unemployment.

WE publish this week some interesting extracts from private letters of an Englishman long resident in Russia, showing how the situation appears to him. In contrast to the dreadful upheaval in that country, it is a relief to turn to Norway, where the separation from Sweden has been peacefully accomplished, and Prince Charles of Denmark, whose wife is daughter of our King, has been cordially welcomed as King. He has taken the name of Haakon VII. His grandfather, the King of Denmark, replying to a deputation from the Storthing, who announced to him the election, expressed the hope that there would be "good co-operation between the King and people for the welfare of the land and its future," and prayed that the new settlement might be "a happiness and blessing to the whole North, and that unity, peace and concord may increase between the nations." To the new King and Queen he said:—"But to you, my dear grandchildren, I address myself with the hope that God may lend you power and strength to serve your country and people with loyalty and righteousness. In this way you will win for yourselves the love of your people and feel yourselves Norwegians chiefly in work for the happiness and future of your country."

WRITING in the new number of The World's Work, Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., says that if the great Hebrew bankers of the world refused to touch any Russian loan, and declared that they would do their utmost to render Russian finance impossible in the capitals of the world, they could make the massacre of Jews impossible. Why they have not already taken this step, it is impossible to understand.

IN Manchester a "Christian Conference" has been invited to assemble before the close of the year to consider social reform. The circular which invites the attendance of members of all religious denominations sets forth—"That it is now necessary for the proper guarding of the health of the citizens of the future that the powers of town councils should be greatly extended with regard to buying and laying out land in the neighbourhood of our towns, and that town councils should possess, and use the power of making, for all land still unbuilt on in and near the towns, plans which must be strictly complied with by all who build on the land, such plans to arrange for the width and direction of the streets, the number and size of the open spaces, and so on." The circular is signed by Dr. Vipont Brown, Principal Graham, Professor Peake, Mr. T. C. Horsfall, Mr. J. L. Paton, and the clergy and ministers of various denominations. Mr. Richard Robinson is secretary of the conference.

THE constitution of the Royal Commission on Poor Law Methods and the Problem of Unemployment is announced this week. Lord George Hamilton is chairman, and among the seventeen other members are Miss Octavia Hill, Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet, Mrs. Sydney Webb, Mr. Charles Booth, and Mr. C. S. Loch.

WE hear with the utmost satisfaction that over 7,000 copies of this quarter's Hibbert Journal have been sent out by the publishers, Messrs. Williams & Norgate, and there is still a good home and foreign demand. Large numbers have gone to distant parts of the world, including Japan, and there is abundant evidence that some of the articles are being discussed in many lands. It is an eloquent sign of the times, full of encouragement for liberal religious thinkers and workers.

THE annual report of the Howard Association (October, 1905) expresses satisfaction at the continued success of the "Borstal" system, and of its extension to other prisons; but it is urged that its benefits should be shared by young women as well as men. The good effects are noted of lectures to women prisoners, given by the lady visitors in England, and to prisoners of both sexes by unpaid volunteer lecturers in Scotland; and approval is expressed of the circular addressed to magistrates by the Home Secretary in July last, recommending the separate treatment of children's cases in the Police Courts. A summary is given of a valuable report on the working of probation in some of the chief American cities, made by Miss Bartlett, a member of the committee, as the result of an exhaustive inquiry which she undertook early in the present year. A considerable part of this report was read at the International Prisons Congress at Buda-pest in September last (which was attended by two representatives of the Howard Association), and called forth an almost unanimous vote in favour of the probation system. At the end of the present year, Mr. Edward Grubb M.A., will be succeeded in the secretaryship by Mr. Thomas Holmes.

THE REVOLUTION IN RUSSIA.

THE following extracts from private letters recently received from Moscow may be read with interest. The writer has been long resident in Russia :—

Moscow, Nov. 7, 1905.

"... We are living here in a very disturbed state of the atmosphere, and the fact is that not a single person in the whole world has the remotest idea of what is going to take place; when we get up in a morning no one knows what will happen during the day. To-day things are a bit quieter here in Moscow; i.e., we do not hear of any particular big riots or murders having taken place yesterday, or up to the present, to-day, but one must not cry out before one is out of the wood.

"Moscow has been in a state of ferment for the last five and a half weeks. It began with a strike of all connected with the printing trade; then, after a lot of disturbances and rows with Cossacks and police, the bakers had a short shindy—all which cost many lives. Then on October 11/24 the general strike on all the railways began, by which we here were cut off from the outside world, except by means of horse carriages and automobiles, which, of course, were only available for a few people.

"A few days later all the employees and workmen of the Town Council struck work, so that there was a sudden cessation of all water, gas, electric light, sewerage, horse and electric trams, &c.

"Through the railway strike all provisions jumped up in price, no milk was obtainable for three or four days, and what with no water and stopped-up sewerage arrangements things looked cheerful! But as there was no gas or electricity, except for those who have their own private installations, as we have at our works, business was suspended early. Added to this the bankers' clerks all struck, and there we were, without provisions, water, or cash, continually in a strange state of uneasiness, the streets full of rioters of all sorts, and a general liveliness of affairs.

"Then this day week, October 18/31, the Imperial Manifesto was published, and all Moscow seemed to go mad with joy. Processions with red flags were all over the place, and much revolutionary and republican talk was to be heard. Of course, the other party was not idle with counter-processions, and then began a lot of shooting and street fights. The police did not, and does not now, seem to care much who and how many are killed and wounded; and these last few days bands of roughs and rowdies, organised (some say) by the police and the reactionary party, have been carrying on a sort of civil war against students and so-called 'intelligents,' and many young people of both sexes have been brutally done to death.

"You see, the people have received 'Liberty,' but they are like children with a new toy. There is nobody among them who ever had an idea what Liberty means, and they go to all sorts of extremes. ... Both sides, the Government and the people, have entirely lost their heads. The only clear-headed persons have been the managers of the great strikes, who have managed their business of toppling the Government over in a most remarkable way, and have evidently not finished their work yet. These strike committees have pulled their wires and let their puppets dance as they thought fit, and are evidently vastly better organised than the Russian Government. The people are—well, it is hard to say what they are; you cannot find a man in the place who knows what he wants, even among the 'intelligents.' As for the working classes and the smaller business people, they, poor things, have never been allowed to think, and are absolutely incapable of a particle of independence. That is where the danger of the present state of things lies. There seems to be absolutely no single man in Russia who knows exacty what must be done. There is no leader either of the reform or the reactionary party who enjoys the respect of the partisans. The present revolution is exclusively destructive and not in the least constructive, and we are on the high road either to excessive dictatorship or extreme anarchy."

November 8.

"The Russians are unable to realise what freedom is; they have absolutely no leaders whom they trust or believe in. ... As for freedom, as we understand it, that will take a long time to introduce here. Among all these manifestations one never sees an elderly person; it is all boys and girls, who are all excitement, but without experience or trained thought."

November 20.

"We go about our usual business and occupations with a general feeling akin to examining a barrel of gunpowder or dynamite by the light of a naked candle. Outwardly things are much quieter, but under the surface exists a huge seething movement, which may show itself at any moment. ... Last evening, at a friend's house, we heard one of these students speechifying to us in explanation of his and other students' views of the general political and social democratic movement. ... In this student and schoolboy movement lies an enormous danger for Russia. The University has now been virtually closed since December 6, 1904, and will most likely remain closed till September, 1906. All the high schools, technical and others, are similarly shut, and numbers of the so-called gymnasia (equivalent to English middle-class schools or grammar schools) have struck, and demand the right of the scholars to choose their own teachers, and determine their own lessons and what they are to be taught. You may fancy the majority of Russian youth, of both sexes, not learning or studying for one and a half to two years; only getting up political meetings and speechifying to workmen and others about fraternity, equality, and the rights of man. It is a sad look out for this country, as these young people are without the least regard for order or discipline, and are at the same time the coming generation. Everybody is stirred up with the feeling that everything is radically wrong, but not a single man can tell you what is to be put in the place of the old order of things. Of course, it is the long-foreseen result of hundreds of years of abominable government carried on by most corrupt organs. ... It is astonishing to hear the absolute contempt and distrust with which every soul here speaks of their Emperor and Government—Witte included ... but I find it hard that not a single one of the shouters and braggers will go and help a little. ... The Government has quite lost its head, but the revolutionary party has never had any, so that the Government will eventually win, and goodness knows whether it all ends in anarchy or dictatorship. But the Government can put no trust in the soldiery or their officers, or even in their civil services, which last have all more or less struck.

"Terrible things have taken place in the provinces, and among the Jews, but here in Moscow, with over 90 per cent. of genuine Russian population, it is hardly probable that we shall have so much fire and murder, as the genuine Russian is a very peaceable sort of a soul, and will hardly hurt anybody unless he is goaded on to do so. But the great danger lies again in the agrarian unrest, which is assuming large proportions in the south, and which the social democrats are attempting to spread to Moscow."

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

SIR,—May I be permitted to remind your correspondent, Mr. Armytage Bakewell, that when he asserts, as he did in your issue of the 25th inst., that peace can be preserved best "by that timely preparation for its maintenance which Lord Roberts and all wise lovers of peace enjoin," he is begging the question. Those of us who are opposed to the growing military Imperial spirit are as patriotic in drawing the attention of our countrymen to what we believe to be a great national danger as Lord Roberts himself, and we can assure Mr. Bakewell that the assertion that only those who think with Lord Roberts are wise lovers of peace does not disconcert us, nor do we hope to preserve peace by "hysterical shoutings," but rather by creating a peaceable and peace-loving spirit, discountenancing militarism, and joining hands with those, not in Great Britain only, but all the world over, who stand for the brotherhood of man and the solidarity of labour. Not by the menace of great armaments shall we persuade men to brotherhood, but by mutual approaches and a recognition of our common humanity will the War Spirit be annihilated. GEO. A. KING.

Norwich, Nov. 27.

THE November number of the Theologisch Tijdschrift completes the thirty-ninth annual volume of this learned and valuable periodical, published every other month at Leiden. The number opens with an elaborate article by Professor Eerdmans on the significance of the story of Paradise. Professor Meyboom, of Groningen, follows with a discussion of the questions raised by Dr. W. B. Smith, of Tulane University, New Orleans, as to "Jesus the Nazarene." Professor Meyboom is not yet convinced that no such place as Nazareth existed. A number of book notices complete the number.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE announce for immediate publication a new volume in the Crown Theological Library, entitled, "History of Early Christian Literature, the Books of the New Testament," by Baron Von Soden, Professor of Theology in the University of Berlin. The volume will comprise nearly 500 pages and will be published at 5s.

LITERATURE.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

I HAVE been reading the "Upton Letters," and a good many other people must have been doing the same, for I see that the book is already in its fourth edition. It is suited admirably for the mood when we are disinclined for engrossing excitements, and what we require chiefly is a gentle stimulus to our own thought. The effect it produces is that of letters written in the confidence of intimate friendship, in which the writer tells us of his work and reading and gives many a revealing glimpse into his own character. But do people write letters like this, so full of matter and so fastidious in literary style, in our hurrying age? Or has the author simply adopted the most convenient medium for his discursive reflections on boys and books and human nature? Some critics have started the suspicion that we are not reading real letters at all. I confess that I have no skill in solving such problems. It is enough that the letters, as they have been given to the world, are full of personality. Clearly, the author, if he may have invented his correspondent, has not invented himself.

He is a schoolmaster engaged in the routine of an English public school. The interest of the book is to a large extent educational in the wider sense, for it is not in the least technical. It is full of schoolboy human nature and of strong discriminating sympathy with its difficulties; but it raises the very serious question whether the seclusion of a number of boys in a sort of comfortable barrack, away from home influences, is good either for their minds or their morals. Parents who are hesitating between a well-equipped day-school and the more fashionable possibilities of a large boarding-school would do well to consider a great many unvarnished and disquieting facts, which are set down in these pages. The book will do real service if it helps to undermine the curious superstition of the wealthy English mind, that the right thing to do with a boy, in order to make a man of him, is to remove him at an early age from the influence of his mother and the natural and healthy discipline of his own home.

On the subject of masters and their failings T. B. has a good deal to say. His remarks about encouraging special aptitudes and taking interest in the slow development of a boy's tastes and character are admirable. "Not to be pompous, and not to hunger and thirst after finding things out" is one of his happy sentences. "The object of detection is to help boys to be better, not to have the satisfaction of punishing them" is another. How true it is that "the boy who develops into a fine man is often ungainly, shy, awkward, silent in early life, acutely sensitive, and taking refuge in bluntness or dumbness"; but it is not many people who can see it so clearly or say it so well. Here, again, is another piece of concentrated wisdom, evidently learned in contact with real life: "A schoolmaster's success (in the best sense) depends almost entirely upon his being able to arrive at sound principles and at the same time to avoid mannerism in applying them. For instance, it is of no use to hold up for a boy's consideration a principle which is quite outside his horizon; what one has to do is to try and give him a principle which is just a little ahead of his practice, which he can admire and also believe to be within his reach." Elsewhere he expresses the same thought with a telling illustration. "I don't believe," he writes, "that in education the highest motive is always the best; indeed, the most effective motive, in dealing with immature minds, is the thing which we have to discover and use. I mean, for instance, that I think it is probably more effective to say to a boy who is disposed to be physically indolent, 'You have a chance of getting your colours this half, and I should like to see you get them,' than to say, 'I don't want you to think about colours; I want you to play football for the glory of God, because it makes you into a stronger, more wholesome, cheerful man.' It seems to me that boys should learn for themselves that there are often better and bigger reasons for having done a thing than the reason that made them do it." T. B. would be an excellent monitor to many men whose calling it is to teach from the pulpit instead of from the master's desk. Possibly he might give them some elementary knowledge of human nature. Many earnest sermons, like the average moral exhortations in school, only beat the air; for there is no contact of sympathy and mutual understanding between the speaker and the hearer.

This brings me to the subject of school sermons, about which he has a number of excellent things to say. It is evident that he feels that for the most part the school service is a golden opportunity lost. "I want more homeliness, more simplicity, more directness in sermons," he writes, "and so few people seem to be aware that these qualities of expression are not only the result of being a homely, simple, and direct character, but are a matter of long practice and careful art." "A boy does not want to be gentle, meek, and mild," he continues, "and I fear I cannot say that it is to be desired that he should. But if a man is shrewd and even humorous first, he can lift his audience into purer and higher regions afterwards; and he will then be listened to, because his hearers will feel that the qualities they most admire—strength, keenness, good-humour—need not be left behind at the threshold of the Christian life, but may be used and practised in the higher regions. Then, too, I think that there is a sad want of variety. How rarely does one hear a biographical sermon; and yet biography is one of the things to which almost all boys will listen spell-bound. I wish that a preacher would sometimes just tell the story of some gallant Christian life, showing the boys that they, too, may live such lives if they have the will. Preachers dwell far too much on the side of self-sacrifice and self-abnegation. Those, it seems to me, are much more mature ideals. I wish that they would dwell more upon the enjoyment, the interest, the amusement of being good in a vigorous way." How cordially most readers will agree with him that goodness should be made interesting, beautiful, and desirable. But from one remark I must express my profound dissent. He recommends that the dull, tired man should read a sermon written by somebody else less common-place than himself. A practice of this kind would be the destruction of preaching, for it robs it of the essential element of personality. I never heard of anybody being edified by the Homilies. The only thing to do with the dull, tired man is to set him to some work in which his heavy weariness will be less fatal than in preaching. Clearly the pulpit is not for him. If a rule of this kind could be put into operation automatically, the number of silenced preachers might be a serious aggravation of the problem of the unemployed. But I fear that I am coming dangerously near home, and may be inventing my own guillotine; so I had better pass on to the more bookish interest of the "Upton Letters."

The pages are not crowded with the names of authors. T. B. appears not as the facile taster of many books, but as the intelligent judge of a few; and the books he likes he reads more than once. Yes, it is intelligence which marks his literary criticism. He succeeds in thinking for himself on matters where it is hard to avoid fashionable judgments. He has no doubt about his favourites. "I do not know any books," he says, "which give me quite the sense of genius that Charlotte Brontë's bring me." Newman is, to him, one of the few masters of English prose. His work is "a white art like the art of sculpture." He loves lucidity and purity in writing, and this makes him run atilt against Browning and George Meredith, "who seem to hold it a virtue to express simple thoughts obscurely." "A novel ought to be like a walk; George Meredith makes it into an obstacle race" is another remark, which enthusiastic Meredithians will treasure up against him. He describes Omar Khayyam as "the most beautiful presentment of pure Agnosticism that has ever been given to the world"; and he hastens to add, "the worst of it is that the delicate traitor makes it so beautiful that one does not feel the shame and futility of it." He defends the Autobiography of Mark Pattison against popular disparagement, and finds in it "the high virtue of thoroughness." His strictures upon the letters of T. E. Brown have less than his usual insight. He dislikes them, and he tries to explain his dislike by wholly inadequate reasons; at least, so it seems to one whose enjoyment of their vividness and buoyancy is still fresh after several years. But here we are dealing with the personal equation, and as T. B. admits with his usual candour, "the victory always remains with the people who admire rather than with the people who criticise."

Whether these are real letters with one intimate friend always in view, or whether they are soliloquies with the world of people who are willing to listen for correspondent, is a matter of small concern. They are, in any case, the expression of a mind of wide observation and keen intelligence, and the note of confidential intimacy adds to their charm. I notice, with more than a tinge of regret, the writer's confession that he is conscious of a growing incapacity for idleness. It is the curse which lies in the path of a life moulded to routine. "In any modern Utopia,'' says Mr. Wells, '' there must be many leisurely people. We are all too obsessed in the real world by the strenuous ideal, by the idea that the vehement incessant fool is the only righteous man. Nothing done in a hurry, nothing done under strain, is really well done.'' The author of the '' Upton Letters '' is one of the people whom the world needs to make it wise. I hope that he will keep the grace of idleness long enough to give us another book.

DR. MARTINEAU'S PHILOSOPHY.*

WHEN, three years ago, the '' Life and Letters of James Martineau,'' by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton appeared, the survey by the latter of Dr. Martineau's philosophical work, which formed the second half of the second valume, was at once recognised as a most admirable and timely piece of work, calculated to be of great service to students of religious philosophy; and on many sides the wish was expressed, and notably, with great earnestness by the late Frances Power Cobbe, that it might be republished in a separate and cheaper form, so as to be available for the widest circulation. That wish has now been met, so far as a separate issue is concerned, and, though a shilling or even a sixpenny, instead of a seven and sixpenny, reprint would have been more welcome still, it is a great satisfaction to have this volume available for separate study, especially as it is enriched by a new Introductory Essay '' On the Relation of Dr. Martineau's Writings to Present Views on the Philosophy of Religion.'' The original work is simply reprinted, the stereo-plates having been corrected in only two or three places, and one further correction added in the new preface, as to the National Review article (p. 287 of the original edition, p. 33 of the reprint), which was not by Morell but R. H. Hutton, Morell's MS. not having been published. On p. 77 (original 331) moial has been left for moral. On p. 224 Mr. Craufurd's name is correctly spelt, but not on the previous page. The mistaken reference to R. H. Hutton on p. 470 of the original has been removed from p. 216, but the index under Hutton still retains it. These small points we note for the next printing. And one other point in this connection. Both Mr. Upton and Mr. Carpenter in his '' James Martineau '' give references to the '' Study of Religion '' from the first edition only; but a great many people use the second edition, in which the paging is different. The double reference would save much trouble.

Mr. Upton's new Introductory Essay, which fills more than thirty pages, will be read with great interest. It deals with some of the most recent criticisms of Dr. Martineau's philosophy, and dwells especially on two dominant thoughts in his teaching and preaching, that of the ever-present and universal Incarnation of God in human souls, and that of the true individuality, moral freedom, and infinite worth, in the view of the Eternal, of every rational soul. That the Incarnation of God was not in Christ only, but progressively in all souls, Martineau taught long before that doctrine became the common property of liberal religious thinkers. In this connection Mr. Upton says :—

'' There cannot, I think, be the slightest doubt that it is this doctrine of the immediate apprehension of God's presence and character in the higher life of man—a doctrine which finds philosophic expression in the second volume of the 'Study of Religion,' and appears in the most varied forms and with infinite wealth of illustration in the 'Endeavours' and 'Hours of Thought,' which constitutes James Martineau's most valuable contributions to the philosophy of religion. All truly religious natures feel, and at times rapturously enjoy, this communion with the indwelling God; but it is only those richly gifted natures, in whom a deeply religious consciousness is conjoined with clear philosophical insight, who can perform for their fellow-men the grand function of intelligently interpreting these ethical and spiritual experiences in which the influence of a Presence, which can in no way be identified with our finite and dependent personalities, is most distinctly realised. It is because Martineau's genius was, like that of the Athenian whom he revered as the world's greatest philosopher, at once profoundly religious and profoundly philosophical, that his works are so accordant with, and so helpful to the highest religious thought and aspirations of the present day. He was a most devoted admirer of Plato, but he was a still more enthusiastic student of the Jewish prophets and of the New Testament, and he found in the latter that divine insight of the Conscience and of the spiritual affections which he felt to be somewhat lacking in the too absorbing Intellectualism of the former. Thus he was enabled both in his sermons and to some extent in his philosophical works also, to express that blending of Greek with Hebraic thought which is so essential to the full understanding of that most central of all truths, the Incarnation and self-revelation of God in the consciousness of mankind.''

As to the second thought, of the true individuality and moral freedom of the rational soul, Mr. Upton notes the two currents of opinion represented by the followers of Hegel, and those who are with Martineau on the Libertarian side, and, after referring to the Gifford Lectures of Professor James Ward, of Cambridge, and Dr. Rashdall's Oxford essays in '' Personal Idealism '' and '' Contentio Veritatis,'' concludes :—

'' This recent emergence of Dr. Martineau's characteristic ideas out of the very heart of the highest culture in our two greatest universities goes far, I cannot but think, to justify Mr. R. H. Hutton's and Dr. John Watson's prophecy that it will be mainly in the direction of Lotze's and Martineau's thinking, and not in that of Hegel's, that the religious world will look for the most adequate expression of the philosophy which is implicit in Christianity.''

The last pages of this essay refer to Mr. Carpenter's study of Dr. Martineau's philosophy in his recent volume, in which, on one point, Mr. Upton thinks a mistaken conclusion has been drawn. It is on the abstruse question of the relation of Will to Force, and their implication in our conception of the creative will of God as the supreme Cause of the universe. Mr. Upton holds that Dr. Martineau retained to the last his conviction that from our experience of self-directed energy we gain our insight into the supreme causal power of God, and that this involves the independent exercise of force by the will. The passage criticised is on p. 573 of Mr. Carpenter's book. '' The question is,'' says Mr. Upton, '' Did Martineau think that human wills could dispose of a portion of this force without themselves exerting any force? If he did so think, whence did he get his first great argument for Theism, seeing that the only Will with which he had any direct acquaintance would have had no experience of the exertion of force but only of the direction of it? ''

DILLON'S JOB.*

THIS book is in some respects a convenient one, for it sets before us the text of the Book of Job as Dr. Bickell, followed by Dr. Dillon, thinks it ought to be. Unfortunately, it is sure to mislead the unwary reader, for it gives him no real opportunity of forming an adequate judgment. It sets out with a number of assumptions, and states them as if they were axiomatic; whereas, each is, to put it gently, in the highest degree precarious. First, we are asked to believe that the 400 verses wanting in the earliest form of the LXX are '' all of them later additions.'' In reality the omissions in the LXX often destroy the connection, while that version retains passages open to grave objection. Further, according to Bickell and his disciple, '' the strophes invariably consist of four lines, every two of which are parallels, and each line contains seven syllables with iambic rhythm.'' Probably, no other scholar living would be willing to accept this theory, which cannot be maintained, save by the most audacious excision and alteration. The reader who desires to appreciate these assumptions at their real value should peruse an admirable article by Dr. Driver in the Contemporary Review for February, 1896. We do not, of course, mean to assert that the whole book, as it stands, in the Massoretic text, represents the poet's original work. There is need for emendation, for excision, and for transposition. There is also, however, need for a sobriety and caution which are sadly lacking in Dr. Dillon's book. It is a very slight performance. We have about 22 pages of introduction, and not quite 70 of translation, without notes. The rest of the space is occupied by a reprint of the version of 1611. There are no notes on the text.

MR. TARRANT'S VERSE.*

OUR readers have already had the opportunity of making acquaintance with some of the forty-six pieces in this welcome booklet. We may remind them of the "Child's Spring Song" (p. 32), the "Cuckoo Song" (p. 60), the lines on "Cleabarrow" (p. 44), and that other charming lyric, which begins,

The willow-wren is back again,
The tit sings in the tree,
The dormouse stretches in his den
And wonders what can be!
And out he creeps, and loud he cheeps,
So glad is everything,
When over Winter's shoulder peeps
The sweet maid Spring.

That should be enough to make any lover of genuine song get this little book, and be glad of the chance to send it as a Christmas greeting to friends.

Mr. Tarrant's hymns are well known in liberal religious circles, and these other verses, if we mistake not, will find their way to many hearts. There is a freshness and sincerity of delight in Nature in the songs, and the true wisdom of life, which knows how to be glad and to help others to be glad, expressed sometimes with a touch of quaintness, which is an added charm, both for the children and their elders. We make bold to say that here is good medicine for seasons of depression and for those who have to live in dreary or common-place surroundings.

The title is explained in the first verse:—

"Bee Songs" are wee songs
Humm'd in hours of labour,—
Thy life and my life
Need a song, my neighbour.

And the wisdom of the book is found in such verses as these:—

The swallow is gone, but the skylark is left us—
See him, and hear him, aloft in the blue!
He says, if of courage the years have bereft us,
Still there is Sunshine for me and for you.

So now, when the ivy is starry with blossom,
Now in November's the time to be gay—
To keep a wee birdie atune in the bosom,
Singing as sweet as on Midsummer Day.

And these other lines, from "Life Says" (p. 17):—

"Out of the night, the morn";
Hark, how the great word goes!
"Out of the soil, the rough black thorn,
Out of the thorn, the rose.
Out of the morn, the day,
The noon-joy clear and strong;
Out of the dust the soul wins a way,
Out of the soul, the song!"

We must not quote too much, or we should add here the first verse of "Rosa Loquitur" (p. 38), "The Miracle" (p. 63), "Poor Pleasure" (p. 42). The two couplets "On Loan" our readers have already seen, but they shall conclude this brief notice:—

"With some of us sick, and with most of us sad,
It hardly seems proper for one to be glad."
Well, come, needy neighbour, at least you can borrow!
I'll lend you a smile—you can pay me to-morrow.

ADELAIDE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

JUBILEE SERVICES.

THE Jubilee of the Unitarian Church in Wakefield-street, Adelaide, S. Australia, was celebrated on Sunday, Oct. 8, when the minister, the Rev. John Reid, M.A., conducted the services morning and evening. In the morning he chose as his text Isaiah lvi. 7, "Even them will I make joyful in my house of prayer." An exposition of this portion of the Prophet's message led up to the subject, "Past, present, and future." He said that day it was the life of the church they had to think of, and that church their own. That day they commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of their form of worship in Adelaide. Fifty years might not count for much in the life of a nation, or in that of a church, but in the life of a young State like their own, as also in the life of themselves as individuals, they counted for a great deal. They owed much to the courageous faith of the little band of true-hearted men who took the steps which led to the arrival in the city on Sept. 19, 1855, of his revered and beloved friend, the Rev. J. C. Woods, B.A. On the second Sunday of October in that year the first public service was held. The men who inaugurated the movement did not waste time, but speedily secured the present site, and on July 5, 1857, the present building was opened for worship. For twenty years his predecessor vigorously carried on the work of the church. Then came a brief respite, during which he revisited his native land. For two years their good and true friend, Mr. Whitham, held the fort. On his return Mr. Woods resumed duty, and only in 1887, when failing health necessitated retirement, did he seek release from his post. That release came only two years later, when a pastorate extending over nearly five-and-thirty years came to an end. Unended, however, was his deep interest in all that concerned the well-being of the church, and his love for those to whom he had ministered for so many years, At his last interview with Mr. Woods a few days ago, the latter talked of the commemoration service, and expressed his strong desire, if God so willed, to be spared until he could hear of its success. He charged him with what there was every reason to believe would be his last message to the people so dear to his heart, "Tell them," he said, and his power of utterance had well-nigh failed him. "Tell them how dear they all are to me; how often I think of them; how I love them all. I have long looked forward to this jubilee, though I scarcely hoped to see it. God's blessing rest upon them all, and on you." For himself he could only add that never had stranger coming to take up work among strangers had truer or more sympathetic friend and adviser than he had found in John Crawford Woods. So the present linked itself with the past; a past that soon would have no living witnesses left to testify to them of its faith, its devotion, its loyalty to God and truth. The remainder of the discourse dealt with the present condition of the church and the outlook for the future, and concluded with a forceful appeal to the younger members of the congregation to take up and continue the good work done in the past. There was another large attendance at the evening service, when Mr. Reid spoke on "The pillar and ground of the truth."

THE "SPIRIT" AND THE "FATHERHOOD OF GOD."

SIR,—It is a difficult task to keep pace with a reviewer who is six thousand miles away, and therefore six weeks ahead of the poor author; but I hope you will allow me to correct a rather serious but unintentional misrepresentation of which my friend Mr. Whitaker is guilty in his review of my last book (THE INQUIRER, September 16). In summing up my position, he says: "It is 'the Fatherhood of God' that Mr. Balmforth seems to indicate as the cardinal point in the teaching of Jesus which our modern thought must reject." This is hardly a correct summary of my position. What I do say is that "the Fatherhood of God" is the cardinal point in the teaching of Jesus which a large body of modern thought does reject. This is a very different thing. But I do strongly object to excluding those who cannot honestly accept the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God from religious fellowship with us. Not "I believe" (the intellectual attitude), but "I love" (the moral attitude) is the true touchstone of religious life. The point is this: Can men (or some men) have a religion without expressing it in theological terms? I say they can. The life of men like Arthur Hugh Clough proves it. All depends on the premises with which a man starts, and that is often a matter of temperament—a most elusive thing from the point of view of logic. We cannot lay down a universal theological premise because men's mental worlds are different.

With regard to the "Fatherhood of God," my own view is this: That if the term "Spirit" (as applied to God) means anything, it implies, not something less, but something infinitely more than human fatherhood. But I must confess that I have no great liking for the term "fatherhood." I prefer the term "motherhood" as implying a deeper tenderness, less emphasis on the non-moral aspect of mere Power, and also as leaving more to the religious imagination. "Fatherhood" especially with the nauseating insistance on almightiness which so often accompanies it, seems to imply, "I could remove the undeserved ills of the world if I would." "Motherhood" implies, "I would if I could." But I prefer the term "Spirit" to either, as necessarily implying "fellow-workers" with it. There is something in what M. Jaurès is reported to have said, that if God were to appear before us in palpable form, we ought not to throw ourselves abjectly before Him as an Almighty Despot, or greet Him with the sickening adulation which is usually meted out to a constitutional monarch, but rather question Him as the friendly citizen of a higher commonwealth.

As another reviewer has fallen into the same mistake as Mr. Whitaker, I can only conclude that the misconception must have arisen through a want of clearness of expression on my part, or through my fatuity in attempting to deal in a dozen pages with a subject which really requires a volume.

As to all the other things which Mr. Whitaker charges against me—that I leap gaily over eighteen centuries of historical development, that I am atomistic, individualistic, and ultra-Protestant, all this is quite new to me. I have always looked upon myself as quite as good a Socialist and Catholic as my friend Whitaker. Indeed, I consider myself a freer Catholic than he, for I would welcome devout agnostics into religious fellowship, whereas he would apparently exclude them. The point may be put, metaphorically, in this way: Would the "Father" exclude men like Mill, Huxley, Spencer, Clough from his spiritual kingdom? If not, why should we exclude them from our church, which should surely be ordered according to the pattern of the kingdom of heaven? I was under the impression that a slight acquaintance with the course of historical and theological development had been one of the means of leading me to this "free Catholic point of view" at which I hope my friend Whitaker will in due course arrive. Indeed, in practice, he has already reached it, as those who are fortunate enough to know him are well aware.

One point more and I have done. "May not," says Mr. Whitaker, "may not the speculative creeds of atonement and mediation, of Trinity, and the rest have been channels of that revelation" [of the Spirit]? Of course they may. And so may the worship of the Virgin Mary and the celebration of the mass. Neither do I regard these as "mere superstitions." They are, in the present stage of human development, the necessary forms or ways in which certain souls envisage the spiritual universe. My chief quarrel with those who hold to these ways is that they insist upon me envisaging the spiritual universe in that way too—a thing impossible to me. It will be seen, then, that I am not against speculative creeds as such. They are necessary. But I am against the attempt to give them first place in our church life, or to make them an essential qualification for religious fellowship. The whole subject is too wide for discussion here, and I can only refer your readers to the first chapter of the book under discussion on "The True Basis of Religious Union."

Meanwhile, if our friend Mr. Whitaker can give us a theology which will shake to their foundations the atomism, the individualism, the ultra-Protestantism, and the Philistinism of most of our modern sects (including Unitarianism) we shall all be grateful.

CHURCHES AND SOCIAL REFORM.

SIR,—It is to be hoped that many of the signers of the "Declaration" published last week will respond to your appeal to elucidate its meaning in detail. Its main purpose is sufficiently evident, viz., to express the conviction that the time has arrived when the valuable work on behalf of various social reforms now undertaken by individual members of our churches needs to be supplemented by some kind of corporate action, in the interest alike of the reforms and of the churches. For who can doubt that, so far as a church is a body of men and women sincerely desirous of being co-workers with God in the service of man, it has a strength, and might exert an influence, especially in its immediate neighbourhood, out of all proportion to the number of its members? And that, on the other hand, for a church as for an individual, "the Spirit of service is the only true revealer of the Spirit of Christ?"

It is my belief that the will only is needed; the ways will open of themselves.

CATHERINE GITTINS.

SIR,—Referring to the declaration on the above subject which appeared in your issue of last week, will you allow me, as one who signed it, and speaking only for myself, to state what I had chiefly in my mind in doing so?

We are in this country confronted with a state of things socially which is, in my judgment, positively appalling—vast numbers of our people living in habitations scarcely fit for sheltering wild animals, much less for the housing of human beings; thousands of innocent and unoffending children forced to attend school with the mental and physical enervation arising from semi-starvation, and their naked limbs half frozen with cold owing to insufficiency of clothing; a vast army of unemployed adults asking, not for charity, but for work, and their wives and children, together with themselves, undergoing the most cruel privations by reason of their inability to obtain it; a terribly large proportion of the population of the whole country drifting in their helpless old age towards the workhouse, or living in constant hunger and misery outside. Well, rightly or wrongly, I feel that these things are a foul blot on our boasted civilisation, a disgrace and a menace to our national greatness, and a scandal on the very name of the religion we all profess in common. I feel, too, having regard to the number and the unmistakable meaning of the precepts uttered by the Founder of the Christian Religion in relation to this very subject of human sorrow and suffering, that there is no institution in the land upon which the responsibility for a ceaseless and determined effort to remedy these awful ills rests more clearly and directly that upon the Christian Church. I am, therefore, emphatically of opinion that all churches alike, our own, of course, included, should (to quote your own words) "take collective action, if not by initiating separate forms of social work, at least by public declarations of principles and policy on questions of social and national well-being." I do not overlook the fact that no Church members have, in their individual capacity, done nobler work in relation to these perplexing and heart-rending social problems than our own; but the inevitable tendency of individual effort is to concentrate its attention exclusively on the relief of immediate necessities, or mere palliatives—a truly necessary and a truly Christian work. There is, however, the far more serious question of getting at the causes of and then prescribing permanent remedies for these terrible evils, and this aspect of the matter can only be adequately dealt with by collective and carefully organised effort. And I regard it as the sacred and bounden duty of every branch of the Church of Christ to move fearlessly in that direction, and to boldly face all possible consequences that may follow from doing so.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. W. WHITELEGGE.

A LINK with a long distant past was severed by the death, at Cork, on Saturday week, of the Rev. William Whitelegge, M.A., at the age of eighty-seven. He was the son of an elder William Whitelegge, who was born in 1781 at Hale, in Cheshire, and was a student of Manchester Academy from 1798 to 1803, and subsequently, from 1811 until 1865, minister of Platt Chapel, Manchester. His son was a graduate of Glasgow University, where he studied from 1836–40 as a Dr. Williams scholar. After a brief ministry at Coseley he settled, in 1843, as minister of Prince's-street Chapel, at Cork, and there remained to the end of his days. A memorial notice in a local paper records of Mr. Whitelegge that during his long sojourn in Cork he was beloved by his flock and esteemed by a wide circle of acquaintances. His kindly and charitable disposition brought him into touch with quite a number of local benevolent and charitable institutions, and his was a prominent figure at the gatherings in support of them. He had been ailing for the past few months, and on Saturday, November 18, he passed away.

MR. JAMES BOOTH.

WE deeply regret to announce the death of Mr. James Booth, which took place at Bath on November 21, in his seventy-eighth year. In early life he spent many years in Australia, and after his return to England settled in Nottingham as a boot and shoe manufacturer. After a successful business career, during which he served for some years on the Nottingham School Board, and was treasurer of the Gordon Boys' Home, he removed from Nottingham. With his wife and their elder daughter he resided chiefly in Bath or the neighbourhood, when they were not travelling abroad. Originally a Congregationalist, Mr. Booth was one of a number of well-known men who, during the seventies were attracted to the High Pavement Chapel by the preaching and personality of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong. In Mr. Booth's case this was the more noticeable because, being under the influence of Herbert Spencer's way of thinking, he might have been supposed to be out of sympathy with the sharp precision which characterised Mr. Armstrong's religious conceptions. The true explanation, doubtless, was the keen intellectual interest and deep religiousness of nature in both men.

Mr. Booth was the last man to make a parade either of his doubts or his faith, and his mental integrity and consideration for others prevented him from accepting offices to which he was again and again invited. In a quiet way he was always ready with his help, but would not take a prominent position lest he should either seem to profess more than he really believed or compromise the cause by what he felt to be his peculiar position. But his love of freedom and progress, his dislike of intolerance, his sense of the importance of the religious factor in life made him deeply interested in Unitarianism. With his fine head and his face beaming with thoughtfulness and kindness he was a notable presence in any company, and he leaves behind a singularly beautiful memory to all who knew and loved him. Their deepest sympathy will go out to Mrs. Booth and her two daughters in their bereavement. J. H.

WILLIAM H. E. EVANS.

ONLY a wandering pedlar, but a staunch and faithful Unitarian worker; in his own way doing pioneer missionary work from door to door, distributing tracts as he peddled his wares, and thus sowing the seed of the liberal religion of which he was so firm an adherent. Many have thus been led to inquire further, concerning the Unitarian faith, through the instrumentality of William Hooper Edwin Evans. He was born at Bristol in 1825, attended the Old Croft Boys' School there, knew Dr. Lant Carpenter and many of the old Unitarian preachers of his earlier years, and later; and could converse intelligently on the writings of Channing, Parker, and other notable writers of our body. He was very zealous in discovering closed or neglected chapels, and in rousing up some indolent minister enjoying an endowment. On one occasion he found one of our chapels closed on the Sunday, and the Unitarian minister occupying the pulpit of an orthodox Nonconformist friend. This was too much for old Evans. He waited upon the delinquent minister next morning, and made his protest with salutary effect. During the last twenty years his abode was in various towns and villages of East Anglia, roving from place to place, returning after an absence of about six months to Debenham, and then away again for another period. The last few years, however, he settled down at Debenham, being advanced in years, and growing more infirm, but almost to the last making journeys to the surrounding villages within a circle of about twelve miles diameter. He frequently walked the seven miles and back on Sunday to Bedfield Chapel to worship with the congregation, and gave valuable information to the Village Missionary, of such as were inclined to fall in with Unitarian teaching; he also made a brave attempt to establish a congregation in Debenham. When he died, November 21, he was still hoping that it might be accomplished.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HEROES IN THE MAKING.

"OH, mother! I've seen such a brave boy," cried a little girl as she ran in from school. "As I passed the river there was a boy wringing out his jacket, while the water dripped out of all his clothes. He had gone in after a small boy who fell in; he got him out all right, but he was in great danger himself, the people said, for he had to go nearly out of his depth and he could not swim. Don't you think he was brave? I wondered whether I should have tried to help the small boy, if I had been near enough. I should like to think I could do it, but I don't feel sure."

"I think that it is possible you would have tried," returned the mother. "I think you are capable of acting bravely when serious danger threatens anybody, because I notice that you do not think first of your own comfort and pleasure when you are taking care of Archie and Rose, but of what is best for them."

"But I should have to make up my mind so quickly."

"That is true, dear, but I am sure that the way in which people act when they have to make up their minds suddenly, in the face of a great danger, is chiefly determined by the way they have been accustomed to act in their everyday life. They have gradually built up in themselves the material out of which heroes are made, or that which goes to form cowards. As long as I see you trying to be unselfish and thoughtful for others I have no fear that you will be cowardly if danger comes."

Probably most children who hear of brave deeds being done on the spur of the moment, ask themselves whether they could have done the same. If you want to make sure that a moment of peril shall find you ready to act nobly, begin to-day to train yourself for that moment. Practise making quick decisions in favour of other people, especially the young, the aged, and the weak. Begin with the very simplest things. You may have to wait years for an opportunity of saving someone in peril; but you need not wait half an hour for a chance of saving others from some annoyance or discomfort, or, at least, of saving them trouble. Harden yourself so that you can bear little hardships cheerfully. Get up as soon as you are called, even when frost is on the panes. Don't grumble when it is too hot. Look out instead for an opportunity of helping somebody else to keep cool. Do anything, just to keep your hand in. Look round the table to see whether other people have had strawberries before you empty the dish for your second helping.

Notice whether your mother, who is busy behind the teapot, has anything on her plate. She will like to have her wants remembered, instead of having to appeal three times to inattentive children before they will hand her the bread. When playing with the little ones, don't insist on choosing the game every time. Boys! do not let your zeal for football lead you into undue roughness in the playing field. When you come back, don't growl if you are asked to take off your muddy shoes before you go upstairs. Girls! don't let your mother mend all the socks for the boys and father. If she says, "I daresay I can manage them, dear," don't let her manage them. Do some yourself, and thus give her time to amuse herself with a book or to join your father in the garden.

I have a grey-headed friend who tells me that when she was quite a little girl she used to wish that some dreadful peril might threaten her parents, some danger from which she might deliver them by sacrificing herself, and thus show how dearly she loved them. "I longed to die for them, or thought I did; but I wouldn't hem dusters for my mother or willingly run to fetch things for my father. I wanted to do some great thing. The little ones brought no glory." She knows now that at that time she was more selfishly than heroically minded. I knew a youth who depended on his sister to wake him, and, what was more, to see that he got up. She used to rise early in order to find time to practise the violin before she went to her daily work as a typewriter. The brother used to keep going to sleep again because he knew that she was so anxious for him to keep his situation that she would leave her violin half a dozen times in order to ensure his being out of bed in time to scramble through his breakfast and catch the early train. Once when he missed the train, I heard him growling unkindly at her for not having "made a bigger row" at his door. Suppose a fire were to break out in the night and wake those two; which of them would be likely to make at once for the front door, and which to rush round to warn and rouse the rest of the house?

A large steamship came to grief on her homeward voyage. When she was filling with water and sinking, another vessel came along, and began to take off the passengers and crew. The men from the engine-room, who thought they had done all they could to prevent the boilers bursting, had found safety on the rescuing ship. The rest of the crew were struggling to follow in desperate haste. Then one of the firemen learned that a certain valve which should have been opened was left closed. To leave it thus was to increase the danger of an explosion. He knew all the risks of going back, but he did not hesitate. He returned to the sinking vessel, went down into the deserted engine-room, and opened the valve. Fortunately, he was able to reach the rescuing ship again just in time.

Margaret Wilson was a girl of about twelve years old who lived in Hull. One day she was amusing herself on a railway line used only for coal wagons. Two tiny children were playing near her on the line. They thought not of danger till Margaret chanced to look up, and, to her horror, saw some heavy wagons coming towards them. She snatched up one child, placed it in safety, and, though the trucks were close at hand, darted back, lifted the other child, and had just time to drop it safely beyond the rails, but had not time to follow it. Brave Margaret died for those helpless little children.

Do you wish to be able to do heroic deeds like these? If you do, lead unselfish, generous lives; then, if the call should come, you will be able to answer "Ready, aye ready!"

FAITH KINDLED IN ACTION.

THE life of our churches must depend on the answer they give to a very practical question, What are they doing for the Kingdom of GOD'S sake? Any discussion as to what their true name may be, or what the world thinks of them, or how they might be better organised, is futile unless there be at their heart the growing power of a genuine vitality; and this there cannot be, unless they are doing from day to day the duty to which they are called of GOD.

We have a great inheritance. In the Scriptures we have the record of the great prophetic age of Israel, the words of the men who knew the strength of the eternal Righteousness, and dared to speak the word of the LORD as it was in their own hearts, concerning the affairs of their own people and the land in which they lived. It was the duty of the present that was urgent to them, for which they were ready to dare in strenuous action and suffer to the uttermost. Out of that true life and all that they endured came the profound and beautiful faith of the Psalmists, and for us much that is best in the hymns of the Church. But their faith and the glory of prophetic ardour cannot help us, if we merely live upon that remembrance and repeat their words. We must be in the same spirit, if we would truly know the glory and the strength of the prophets. We must be living not in the past, but in present duty, concerned above all things with the grievous needs of our time and the claims of inexorable righteousness; we must be ready for fearless action, and as fearless, patient endurance, amid the present concerns of our social and national life. Then only can we hope, in all the fulness of a true spiritual life to be face to face with GOD, and to know the strength of His righteousness, which we, in our place of duty, are called to put into action.

That great prophetic history of old, so disastrous in its outward fortunes, yet flowering in the deepest purest piety, of the ancient world, rose suddenly again, as it seemed, by the new birth of a holier life, to its supreme height in one Man, the nearest of all to GOD, in closest sympathy with the needs and the affections of the common people. In him we find the truest measure of our manhood, and therein the spirit in which we also may enter into the inheritance of the children of GOD. In the fellowship of CHRIST, as his disciples, we best learn the secrets of the inward life with GOD, and have the deepest insight into the meaning of the Kingdom of GOD on earth. But there again, not by repetition of his words of faith, or the mere taking of his name, only as we are truly living in the same spirit, doing amid the common things of our daily life and in our daily intercourse with people, in business and the management of common affairs, municipal, national, and international, what JESUS would have us do—what is true to his spirit of brotherhood, and the great hunger after righteousness, with love of brother and neighbour, not in word but in deed and in truth. This is matter of daily urgency, and only as that urgency gathers out of the stress of daily life into the hour of Sunday worship will the spirit of vital religion move with all its redeeming power, in our churches.

We gather for worship, not of an ancient tradition, but of the living GOD. To His presence we were wakened by the sunrise of that very day. His law of righteousness penetrates to every corner of our city and our land, and is there silently in every foulest place. His love no less is a silent presence, brooding over the whole wide and complex field of life, searching and finding the pure and humble heart in intimate communion. We are to be with GOD, in those things for which He cares the most, in living obedience to His law, surrendered to His will, in which the mystery of His perfect love is made known to us. It can only be as we are seeking with our whole heart and striving with our whole strength to know and to do His will.

So, then, as a people we must come together in our common worship with this practical purpose in our hearts, conscious, as we join together in the psalm of thankfulness and supplication and in earnest prayer, that we are veritably set on that high endeavour in every concern of life to do our FATHER'S will, knowing that it is His country in which we live, and His city of which we are citizens. And when we recall the ancient prophetic words, in the companionship of JESUS, it must be because they will help us to the best wisdom and strength for the doing of the work of our own day.

We often mourn that there is so little vigour in our church life, so little power of attraction, by which the solitary and the wandering are gathered in to the new fellowship, and made aware of a quickening and helpful spirit, which answers to their every need. Then let us see to it, that we bring our lives, and therefore our religion, into closer touch with the needs and aspirations of the people, and give free way to such earnest purpose and generous sympathy, that the common weal may become our most strenuous endeavour and aspiration, because that is GOD'S purpose in our life. We need not fear that differences of political or economic judgment, with such a spirit dominant, would mar the concord of our worship. Politics would no longer be degraded by unworthy temper, or felt by any to be out of place in the church. A new wave of earnest aspiration and deep human sympathy would lift our worship to a higher level, give new reality to the words of faith, a happy constraining power to the simple gathering in quiet heartfelt fellowship. GOD would be more truly near, and a very present help and inspiration in the lives of those who were so set to do His will in the common things of daily life. The power of unselfish love never yet failed to attract and kindle the new and better life in other hearts, giving the best help just where the need was greatest.

HARNACK, as we briefly noted last week, has not resigned his professorship in the University of Berlin. The following is the passage of his letter to Dr. Newton Marshall, to which we referred, as given in the Christian World:—"I shall be very grateful to you if you will contradict the malicious and false rumours that are being spread. I have taken over the direction of the Royal Library in addition to my other duties. My chief office remains my professorship in the theological faculty. I deliver my lectures as heretofore, and conduct the theological seminar as heretofore. I only propose to reduce somewhat the number of my hours of lecturing. My theological literary activity remains unaltered, and I shall have enough free time for it; for I have not assumed the management of the library in all its details, but only its presidency (oberste Leitung.) This I have done because I feel it right that there should be at the head of this great scientific institute, a professor of the Berlin University, and a member of the Academy of Sciences. The whole matter has nothing whatever to do with the present condition of theology, and my opinion as to the same. The hopes of my opponents that I am turning my back upon theology will, to their sorrow, not be fulfilled. The public and the papers are ready to believe the most stupid tales! How could I, at the age of fifty-four, desert a field of labour in which I had worked thirty-two years, and how could I expose to attack (preisgeben) a work that flourishes exceedingly, and is making progress year by year!

Preisgeben would perhaps be better translated:—"How could I leave the work of liberal religious thought undefended at the mercy of its foes?"

DEVELOPMENTS OF PAULINE TEACHING.*

I.

THE acknowledged letters of the Apostle Paul throw a light of exceptional brilliance both upon the aims and methods of his own apostolate, and upon the condition of the churches which he addressed. The close of his career is shrouded in darkness. Ecclesiastical tradition asserts his martyrdom in Rome in the fatal year of Nero's great persecution, 64 A.D., when a similar doom is said to have overtaken the Apostle Peter. One after another the "brethren" of the Lord must have passed away, but the dim stories of antiquity contain no certain details. A thick cloud seems to settle over the whole Christian scene; and it does not rise for two generations. Only here and there can the circumstances of the churches be discerned with any clearness, as when Clement writes from Rome to the church at Corinth, about 96 A.D. And yet this period was of the utmost consequence for the future of Christianity. The great formative ideas had been sown; what blossom and fruit would they produce? Working forwards from the records of the New Testament, and backwards from the writers of the second century, the historian endeavours to present a picture of the movements of the intervening age, the various processes of thought, the decay of one set of controversies and the rise of others, the conditions of church life, and the growth of its government and institutions. In doing so, he is confronted with a number of documents now contained in our canon. They bear apostolic names, but they are of more or less doubtful authorship. There is, however, a peculiar difficulty in determining their origin, for they are often themselves the only evidence for their own date. The problems which they suggest can be solved only by the correct interpretation of the indications which they alone supply. The student endeavours by their aid to reconstruct the manifold activities of the church; but, when he seeks to justify their use, he has often no better proof than the fact that they seem thus to fit best into the scheme he has devised. The conclusions of such circular reasoning can never escape some uncertainty; confidence must give way to probabilities of varying degree. The letters thus affected, bearing the name of Paul, are those to the Ephesians and Colossians, and those to Timothy and Titus (the so-called Pastoral Epistles). If not by the apostle himself, they at any rate proceed from writers who believe that they reproduce his teachings, and desire the shelter of his authority. Such a method of composition had long been recognised both in Jewish and Gentile schools. Books like Ecclesiastes and the Wisdom of Solomon were ascribed to the royal sage of Jerusalem. Baruch, Jeremiah, and Manasseh appear as authors in the Apocrypha. Famous names were, in the same way, invoked by the students of philosophy, and the two centuries immediately before and after our era saw the issue of a whole series of pseudonymous works. It is, however, highly probable that behind some of these Pauline documents, notably behind Colossians and 2 Timothy, there may lie real letters which were afterwards expanded by other hands. We know that many books of the Old Testament reached their present form by processes of this kind. It can be traced also in the Synoptic Gospels, and it is not impossible that similar treatment may have been applied to some of the apostolic correspondence.

(1) The peculiarities of these letters are of various kinds. There are diversities of style and language compared with Paul's acknowledged compositions. There are historical difficulties connected with their place in his career. There are marked differences of thought; some of the characteristic ideas of the apostle seem to have disappeared, the stress of his interest has largely changed, and there are indications, it is believed, of the rise of new movements belonging to a later day, or of the development of an ecclesiastical order in which he could have had no share. Of these considerations the force in each individual case cannot be uniform. The total impression must rest upon variations in detail. In particular, the argument founded on style will seem to some conclusive and to others almost worthless. The manner of a great painter may change; consider the phases of a Turner or a Millais. The entry of a new intellectual influence may modify the method of the literary man; take "Sartor" and its German antecedents out of the life of Carlyle, and how shall its earlier and its later modes be bound together? And yet it is difficult to suppose that any such conditions operated on the Apostle Paul. He was not exposed to fresh and invigorating impulses from an unknown literature. The general impression in passing from Colossians to 1 Timothy is rather that of decline than of increase in strength. It is needless here to produce lists of words and phrases, but some statistical results may not be uninteresting. How far, for example, do these letters show a vocabulary resembling that of the recognised epistles? It has been computed* that Colossians contains 33 words not found (outside Paul) in the New Testament, 25 of which have not been previously used by Paul. New themes may have begotten new phrases. But this peculiarity tends constantly to increase: Ephesians shows 76 words not in Paul, and most of them nowhere else in the whole canon. In the Pastoral Epistles, out of the total list of 897 words, 304 are not in the recognised letters of Paul, and 171 not otherwise in the New Testament. Moreover, out of the 593 which Paul also employs, only the small number of 39 belong to his peculiar terminology. Even more significant, perhaps, are the fresh groups of grammatical form, differences in the structure of sentences, and the appearance of new sets of expressions in lieu of the usage of the great epistles. Tried by these tests, Colossians approximates so closely to the Pauline style that it can hardly be distinguished from it linguistically. From different points of view Ewald and Renan ascribed its substance to the apostle, its redaction to Timothy. But such conjectures are inevitably insecure, and recent criticism has tended to establish its claim to Pauline authorship, though it remains uncertain when and where it was written. If it was sent from Cæsarea, Harnack places it within 54 and 56 A.D.; if from Rome, between 57 and 59; while Moffatt prefers a later date, about 61, and Jülicher votes for 62 or 63. Concerning Ephesians recent opinion is more doubtful. In this country Dr. T. K. Abbott, Dr. Lock, and Dr. Armitage Robinson have all argued for the Pauline authorship, and this view is supported by scholars in Germany and the United States, such as Jülicher and Bacon (in their respective "Introductions to the New Testament"). Dr. Moffatt, however, remains unconvinced. "No argument," he says in his invaluable "Historical New Testament," "seems totally decisive. . . . . Conclusions in favour of authenticity can hardly fail to be tentative. . . . . The question may be not unfairly said to remain open in the present state of criticism." And in the elaborate treatise of Professor Carl Clemen on the apostle's life (2 vols., 1904), the question is vigorously settled in the negative, partly on literary grounds, partly for other reasons. Pfleiderer, as is well known, regards both the epistles as the products of a later Pauline school, though he recognises the probability that Colossians rests on original materials from the apostle's own hand. In their present form they indicate the intervening links of development between Paul and the Ignatian and Johannine Christologies.

(2) A second order of inquiries may be founded on the connections of the letters with the apostle's life. Is it possible to fit them appropriately into its known incidents? And if not, what suppositions would be required to find them a place? The Pastoral group, bound together (as all critics feel) by striking common resemblances, is most affected by this difficulty. 1 Timothy, for example, refers to movements of the apostle which cannot be accommodated within the scheme supplied by the narrative of Acts and the personal references elsewhere. In the comparative uncertainty as to the date of his martyrdom in Rome, it has been suggested that a late tradition of his liberation after his first imprisonment (first mentioned in the fourth century) would supply the necessary opportunity. The years are not preoccupied with other claims; why not save them for the events here implied? The silence of earlier witnesses about any such renewal of his activity is not, however, to be lightly ignored. The closing narrative of Acts assumes (xx. 25) that Paul has paid his last visit to Ephesus; but in 1 Tim. i. 3, 4 it is plain that the writer addresses Timothy in that city, and in iii. 14, iv. 13 he promises to join him there himself. The most trustworthy chronologers of the apostle's career recognise, however, but one imprisonment. In that case, the situation is incorrectly represented in 2 Timothy, which is written, apparently during that detention (i. 8, 17). It is addressed to Timothy, who has not been with him. But in Phil. ii. 19, 23 Timothy is with Paul, and is to be sent to Philippi, when he knows something definite about the trial. There are references to articles left at Troas, and to incidents preceding the apostle's arrest (iv. 13, 20), as though the matters were recent, while the story of Acts interposes an interval of years. The detailed proof of these inconsistencies must be sought elsewhere. Yet most of the scholars who have rejected these letters have felt that there are other indications of post-Pauline authorship which are of greater moment. Beyschlag may appear in his turn prejudiced when he roundly asserts: "Only prejudice can fail to appreciate the weight of reasons which turn the scale in favour of a post-apostolic origin" ("New Testament Theology," ii. 501). But his next remark deserves careful attention: "That the Epistles cannot be placed within the life of the apostle without the assumption of a quite improbable second Roman imprisonment is the least of these reasons." Grave as are the historical objections, there are others that are graver still.

(3) The apostle's ministry was chiefly occupied with one great conflict—the vindication of the right of the Gentiles to receive the Gospel without undertaking the obligations of the Law. If this is not a prominent theme in his teaching, as in Galatians and Romans, it is at any rate in the background. It determines his view of the meaning and conditions of salvation; it is closely connected with his great doctrine of righteousness by faith. But these conceptions are fading out of sight. They remain only, and in their most beautiful form, in the delineation of the mystic union of the disciple with Christ in Col. iii. 1–11, which can hardly be ascribed to any imitative hand. In Ephesians there is no more struggle, no more passionate insistence; the battle is over, and the reconciliation is complete.* And in the Pastoral Epistles there seems a further change. The Greeks were not interested in the arguments which had filled so large a place in Paul's mind. They had not felt the burden of the Law, and they did not care for his explanations about its abolition. His vehement repudiation of its bondage did not appeal to their moral experience. But they knew the danger of "unchartered freedom"; they needed guidance; they wanted a practical discipline, a moral direction to guard them against excess. Hence came a view of Christianity as an effective moral teaching, a new law, ethical, not ceremonial, centred in the person of Christ. He died to deliver men from "lawlessness" (Titus ii. 14); he was the supreme type of righteousness and piety, the dedication of the whole man to the will of God. For this self-consecration the writer has a special term. The life of Jesus was the "mystery of godliness" (1 Tim. iii. 16). This word and its cognates appear thirteen times in this brief group, but in no other letters ascribed to Paul. Connected with it is the prominence given to instruction. Christianity is the "healthful teaching" (another new phrase—1 Tim. i. 10, 2 Tim. iv. 3, Titus i. 9, ii. 1) with a twofold aspect. It is set forth as a summary of principles of character, a way of right living, when it is called "the teaching according to godliness" (1 Tim. vi. 3); or it comprises right doctrine as the "knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness" (Titus i. 1). So "faith" loses the deep meaning which it had for Paul, as the mysterious power which linked the believer to his Lord, and enabled him to pass through the same profound experiences by death into new life; it is rather the single expression for the acceptance of the whole body of Christian verities, the "healthful words," the "words of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Tim. vi. 3). It is something, therefore, that can be imparted and preserved: Timothy has been "nourished in the words of the faith and of the fair teaching" (1 Tim. iv. 6), and he is exhorted to "guard the deposit" (vi. 20, 2 Tim. i. 12, 14). The faith has become a trust, to be maintained in its integrity against the corruption of false teachers (cf. 1 Tim. i. 18, 2 Tim. ii. 2). The church has travelled a long way from the first stages of its "walk in the spirit."

(4) Again, there are indications of change in what may be called the religious atmosphere. In the different countries round the Eastern Mediterranean there were various forms of worship, partly Oriental in type, which veiled their doctrines in secret "mysteries." There had been famous "mysteries" for hundreds of years in Greece itself. They were not associated with philosophy, which had little or nothing to say about the powers of darkness with which the powers of light were in conflict. The Greek thinkers meditated profoundly on the Wisdom or Thought in the world, on the manner in which the divine Reason might show itself, on the evidence of purpose or design in nature. Some of these ideas might be applied to Christ. But there are elements (especially in the closely related Colossians and Ephesians) which cannot be wholly explained from this source—glimpses into a world quite unlike that which we know by science (with the order and unity of which the Greek mind was in deep sympathy); conceptions of mediatorial powers and strange unknown agencies, some good, some evil, which are busily waging the everlasting battle, and need to be in some way harmonised and subdued. This type of speculation easily allied itself with a doctrine of a hidden wisdom. In spite of the firmness with which it held to the idea of the unity of God who acted immediately on all creation, Jewish thought had already shown a tendency to imagine God as operating by various powers which could be in some sense regarded as semi-personalised agents. These were the ministers of his will, the messengers between his being as pure spirit, and the world of sense. This problem was discussed with still greater eagerness in some other schools. It seemed to have a peculiar fascination for minds that were deeply affected by the contrast which has begotten so many philosophies, between the Many and the One, the panorama of change in time, and the immutability of Being in eternity. Out of this cycle of conceptions arose a number of new modes of combining the manifestation of Christ with the ultimate source of all existence. They were founded on the notion of a secret knowledge, or "Gnosis," ultimately, perhaps, derived from the apostles, and continued in the possession of teachers who professed to know. In after days these teachers bore the title "Gnostics,"* and they seem to be already in sight when the Pastoral Epistles were composed; for through the whole texture of these documents runs a thread of warning against false teaching which can only be met by resolute adherence to the true tradition. This "different doctrine," with its "myths and endless genealogies" (1 Tim. i. 4, cf. Titus iii. 9), may perhaps be explained by a reference to the fabulous pedigrees of æons and emanations by which the descent of Christ was traced from God.† The interpretation cannot be regarded as certain; but it seems to receive some confirmation from another conjecture. One of the most famous of the Gnostic teachers was named Marcion, who came to Rome from Sinope on the Black Sea about the year 140 A.D. He was the author of a famous work called the "Antitheses," or "Oppositions," in which he contrasted the anthropomorphic representations of God in the Old Testament with the spiritual teachings of the New. Now, the first letter to Timothy (which there is some reason for regarding as the latest of the group to which it belongs) ends with the following warning (1 Tim. vi. 20, 21):—"O Timothy, guard the deposit, turning away from the profane babblings, and "Antitheses" of the 'Gnosis,' falsely so called, which some professing have erred concerning the faith."

May we identify these "Antitheses" with Marcion's book? It would not be necessary to bring down the whole epistle to a contemporary date. The injunction, so oddly thrust in at the close, may possibly be the postscript of a later hand.‡ But such an addition would reflect an unmistakable light on the character of the danger to the faith caused by "seducing spirits and doctrines of demons," together with the false asceticism (1 Tim. iv. 1–4) which such modes of thought demanded of their votaries.

(5) It is consistent with this general view of the later character of the Pastoral Epistles that they should imply an order of Church usage and institutions considerably more advanced than we have reason to expect in the days of the Apostle Paul. Here, once again, we have no certain standards of comparison. We have seen in our own day the swift development of a great religious organisation—the Salvation Army. We recall the names and achievements of Dominic and Francis, of Loyola, of Wesley, and many another in the long roll of leadership. But their work was wrought under very different conditions, and their successes are no measure of the circumstances of the first century. The earliest communities lived in a state of exalted emotion, fed by prophesying, and concentrated on the hope

* When the writer speaks (iii. 5) of the "holy apostles," do we really hear the voice of Paul? For various suggestions of glossing, punctuating, and the like, see the commentators. Abbott's suggestion that a bishop might legitimately speak of his "right reverend brethren" seems to miss the mark.

* Cf. Addis, "Christianity and the Roman Empire."

† It should be observed, however, that Tit. i. 14 speaks of "Jewish Fables."

‡ Two peculiar expressions mark the verse, "oppositions and knowledge" falsely so called. On the other hand, cf. "guard the good deposit" (2 Tim. i. 14,) "profane babblings" (2 Tim. ii. 16).

of the speedy advent of their Lord. Not till this had begun to lose its intensity did the meeting for worship tend to embody certain regular and permanent elements, such as the prayer of intercession for kings and magistrates (1 Tim. ii. 1). Phrases of fixed type suggest that the formation of a "rule of faith" is already begun:—

"I charge thee in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and of Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed the good confession" (1 Tim. vi. 13).

"Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel" (2 Tim. ii. 8).

"I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus, who shall judge the quick and dead" (2 Tim. iv. 1).

The gifts of the Spirit are not ignored, but they are no longer free, alighting on the souls God chooses; they are dependent on the physical act of official persons; they are communicated by the "laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. iv. 14, cf. 2 Tim. i. 6). Presbyters are nowhere named by Paul, though the church at Philippi contained bishops and deacons (Phil. i. 1). No doubt, at this stage of church order the higher officials could bear both titles—elders and bishops—for they are plainly identified in Titus i. 5–7. But the point of interest lies in the view of ecclesiastical circumstance which the functions and qualifications of these officers suggest. The bishop must not be a new convert (1 Tim. iii. 6); he must be blameless as God's steward, and free from all love of money; he must, moreover, be fit to teach (1 Tim. iii. 2), or, as is said elsewhere (Titus i. 9), "holding to the faithful word which is according to the teaching, that he may be able both to exhort in the healthful teaching, and to convict the gain-sayers."

The first age of the churches had no fixed body of teachers. Instruction was a gift of the Spirit, like prophecy or healing. It was only when the freshness of enthusiasm died out that it was found necessary to safeguard the efficiency of teaching by restricting it to the accredited officers of the community. The Pastoral Epistles apparently represent a stage upon this path later than the large liberty of Paul's own day. It is for the elders specially to "labour in the word, and in teaching." With them lies the real responsibility for the faith of the Church; and the writer's exhortation to Timothy was doubtless intended for a wider circle of young believers (2 Tim. iii. 14): "Abide thou in the things thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them."

(6) If the indications thus briefly noted are correctly interpreted, the group of letters following Colossians represents in different degrees the effects of a contact with Gentile influences closer and more far-reaching than was possible when Paul first carried Christianity through Greece. Yet, as they bear his name, they may at least be assumed to proceed from those who believed themselves to be the heirs and representatives of his principles. In their references to Jesus, accordingly, they tend to conform to the expressions of the apostle. There are, indeed, noteworthy omissions. The doctrine of the Christ as spirit has disappeared. He is no more presented as the type and origin of the new humanity. The language about him has lost much of its fresh and plastic character; it has become more official and less personal. The Pauline distinction between God and Christ is, indeed, maintained in parallels of phrase, such as the following:—

"Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God. . . . . Grace to you and peace from God our Father. We give thanks to God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Col. i. 1–3.)

"Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ according to the commandment of God our Saviour, and Christ Jesus our hope; unto Timothy, my true child in faith: Grace, mercy, peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord" (1 Tim. i. 1, 2, cf. 2 Tim. i. 1, 2).

Elsewhere we read of "God, Christ Jesus, and the elect angels" (1 Tim. v. 21), a group which no one has proposed to bind together in deity; or of "God the Father and the Lord Jesus" (Eph. vi. 23), of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (ib., i. 3); or, with even more decided emphasis, of "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the father of glory" (ib., i. 17). This last combination seems entirely to exclude the participation of Jesus in the Godhead. Yet, on the other hand, more exalted functions seem assigned to him, especially in that pre-existent state from which he descended to mingle with humanity. What was left uncertain by Paul in earlier letters is here more clearly defined, and the significance of the Christ for creation as well as for redemption, receives fresh emphasis as the scope of his activity in heaven and earth expands. Can we trace the steps of thought which lead to this result?

LYTTLE MEMORIAL SCHOOLS.

MANY friends in all parts of England and Ireland have expressed the desire to see some memorial erected to the memory of the late Rev. Richard Lyttle. After due consultation a committee has been formed for this purpose, and it has been decided that the memorial shall take the form of new school buildings at Moneyrea. The buildings, which will cost £1,250 to erect, are much needed, and the form of the proposed memorial is much commended by all who knew Mr. Lyttle's work among the young. Principal Gordon says:—"I especially commend the shape which it is proposed that this memorial shall take. By the placing of adequate school buildings at Moneyrea exactly the kind of service will be rendered which Mr. Lyttle himself would have joyed to promote. By his unexpected death his church, his friends, and the community have sustained a loss which all must feel. It is well that there should be a standing memorial worthy the name of one who lived for others and won universal regard." Dr. J. E. Odgers also highly commends the idea of a memorial and its proposed form. In Ireland Dr. Keightley and Mr. W. Gibson, J.P., are acting as secretaries, and Mr. A. K. Stewart as treasurer. In England a committee has been formed of Mr. Lyttle's old friends and class-mates, with the Revs. C. Peach and T. P. Spedding as secretaries. A biographical sketch, with portrait and press notices, has been published, and may be had post free on application to the Rev. C. Peach, 68, Richmond-grove, Manchester, to whom English donations should be sent. Friends in Ireland are asked to forward their donations to Mr. A. K. Stewart, Dundonald, co. Down.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION

THE committee of this Association are unwilling that any reply should be made to the Rev. A. Webster's letter in THE INQUIRER of November 18 before their annual report is before our readers. Here it is:—

Forty-Fifth Annual Report.

Your committee beg to report that during the past year their attention has been almost wholly devoted to the affairs of the churches situated at Kilmarnock and Kirkcaldy.

In pursuance of the policy advocated and confirmed at the last annual meeting of the Association, the Rev. James Forrest and the secretary were directed to proceed to London, and make a special appeal to the McQuaker trustees for a grant in aid to each of these churches of at least £150 per annum for three years certain, to enable them to secure competent ministerial services. Dr. Barlow also accompanied the deputation, and attended the the meeting in his official capacity as a member of the Executive Committee of the B. and F. U. A., and before proceeding to London we were careful to put the whole of that committee in individual possession of all the facts relating to the position at both the places named.

A large attendance of the committee favoured your deputation with an audience, and gave them an attentive and courteous hearing, while several of the members interrogated them in regard to all the points at issue. Before departing from the meeting your representatives were impressed with the fact that the general feeling of the committee seemed to be that our request was a very moderate one, tending if anything towards insufficiency rather than extravagance, and we learned later that in the subsequent discussion this view was amply confirmed.

During that discussion, we understand a motion was submitted by the ex-President of the Association (who had visited both places during his occupancy of the chair, and had an opportunity of forming a direct opinion) proposing to accede to our request, but it was ultimately decided to remit the matter to the Sub-Committee on Scottish affairs for further consideration and report.

From the tone and tendency of the proceedings your representatives were very sanguine of the success of their mission, and were all the more grievously astonished and disturbed when a resolution adopted by the sub-committee, and confirmed by the executive, was received, proposing the usual grant of £100 per annum towards ministerial services at Kilmarnock, with an increasing amount according to a stated sum being provided by the Scottish Unitarian Association or the congregation.

We were at considerable pains to impress on the Committee during our visit that the congregation itself could not provide any sum towards ministerial services meantime, and that the funds of the Scottish Unitarian Association were not sufficient to allow them to do so, and recognising in the London proposal the rejection of our suggestion to firmly establish these churches, and believing it to be ill-devised, and of a character which made it subject to grave abuse, we refused to accept it, and the Kilmarnock congregation itself took a similar course.

There being thus no likelihood of the congregation being enabled to appoint a capable and efficient minister who might add to their number and increase their means, and as your Association's funds were rapidly diminishing, the question of being longer able to retain possession of the Kilmarnock property was forced prominently on our attention.

As most of the members are aware, this property is held by us and we are responsible for its contingent liabilities and upkeep.

That responsibility was undertaken by us at a time when the congregation themselves could no longer continue it, and when this Association had sufficient means to warrant its action in assuming it, with the express intention of freeing the Kilmarnock congregation from a constant and pressing barrier to their success. But for our then intervention this property would at that time have been disposed of, and the congregation forced either to disperse or reconstruct themselves under less burdensome conditions.

And now our own resources having become very limited, unless some other means could be found of in turn relieving ourselves of the responsibilities we had assumed, we were face to face with the duty of securing that relief at all costs in the interests of the continued and unfettered freedom of the Association to undertake any efforts in the Scottish field in general, for which it undoubtedly exists.

The subject was subsequently surveyed and discussed at length, and your committee were ultimately compelled to adopt a resolution to take steps to dispose of the property, giving a first opportunity to the McQuaker trustees to acquire it, or to enter into negotiations to relieve us of the liability of its retention.

This body refused to entertain any such suggestion, and the matter has now been put into proper hands for negotiation and disposal.

Looked at from any standpoint this course is undoubtedly very much to be regretted, but there was no other possible means of relieving ourselves of a serious and pressing difficulty and of an obstacle to the further advance and efficiency of this Association.

As regards Kirkcaldy, while our representations to the McQuaker trustees were similar to those indicated for Kilmarnock, and while there is no financial difficulty so far as that congregation are concerned, all that the McQuaker trustees had agreed to do up to the end of September, was to consider the name of any minister the congregation or ourselves cared to submit as an applicant for the ministerial vacancy there.

The church management, recognising that this was mere trifling with a serious matter by a body who claimed to be discharging a sacred trust in Scotland, decided to resign en bloc from their official position at the end of this year; this was intimated to the McQuaker trustees without causing any alteration in their attitude, and so the matter rested until a conference of representatives of all the churches and the S.U.A. at the invitation of the McQuaker trustees assembled at Aberdeen, on September 30. The first impression made at that meeting regarding Kirkcaldy was that the McQuaker trustees had decided that nothing could be done, but so strongly unanimous was the expression of opinion made by the delegates attending in favour of the course advocated by your committee, that the trustees have been induced to reconsider their attitude with the result that we have now the pleasing intelligence to convey, that they have passed a resolution giving effect wholly to our proposals, and steps are being taken to put them into operation.

Not alone is this decision hopeful and encouraging, but other methods now for the first time adopted by the trustees denote either a new aspect or a new policy, which we hail with the most unanimous approval and satisfaction, and shall extend to its furtherance the greatest assistance in our power.

We are of the opinion, however, that if this Scottish Association, with its record of past usefulness in many directions, is to be put on a plane of greater utility, steps must be taken to give it greater freedom of action in the future, to add to its own members and effect its own propagandist work, and you will be invited to so adjust the constitution of the Association that its energies and whatever means it may become possessed of, may be directed to the most general advantage and advancement.

It has not failed in the past to do good and useful work, and in the future, with new ideas and new enterprise, it will, at least, arduously endeavour to undertake little by little but surely and stedfastly to retain not only one or two scattered provinces with church connections, but also to enfold within its ranks members from every city and town of any standing, from the Moray Firth to the Solway.

This is a work that is suited to us as an Association; we need not expect to do it in one year or in perhaps many, but if the present members of our Association, think it something that could be done and might, then, with their assistance and co-operation, with thankfulness for the benefits we have ourselves received in our religious community, it can be done, and it will.

BOTH the critical reason and the experience of the inward man have their times of dulness and non-illumination. Faith is the unswerving trust, at such seasons, in the enduring verity of those things, which in their moments of power and illumination, the critical reason and the experience of the soul have taught us. —R. A. Armstrong.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Mansford-street. — The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from The Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E.:—"I shall be very grateful if you will again allow me to ask your readers for help. As you and your readers must know, a minister in charge of a Mission Church relies on the goodwill and generosity of his friends, and of all who are interested in mission work, to supply him with funds; and the claims upon the funds at this time of the year are very heavy. I therefore ask your readers to help me—not only to fill the Poors' Purse, upon which I can draw throughout the year, but to provide me with a special fund, by means of which I may add a little joy and brightness to the lives of some of the poorer people in this district at Christmas time. Old clothes and boots and shoes, especially for children, will also be very acceptable.

Billingshurst.—On Wednesday, Nov. 15, Rev. Priestley Prime, of Brighton, gave a most interesting lecture on "The Garden City." The Working Men's club-room was lent for the evening, and the chair was taken by a leading Churchman and ardent Conservative. Excellent lantern views were given. The chairman and many others in the audience said they greatly enjoyed the lecture, and hoped arrangements would be made for additional lectures during the season.

Blackburn.—The first of a series of religious services by Unitarian ministers was held at the Exchange Hall, Blackburn, on Sunday, November 26, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie delivered a discourse on "The Religious Message of Unitarians." He stated that the services had been organised from a desire to be helpful to men and women who were unable to find in orthodox creeds and churches a religious faith which satisfied their intellectual and spiritual needs. Unitarians had found joy and peace, as well as enlightenment, in their religion, and it was their duty as well as their privilege to make it known to others. Although the night was wet and stormy there was an attendance of 200 people, including a few Unitarians from Accrington, Burnley, Padiham, and Preston. The singing of the hymns was very hearty, led by the harmonium, and a small orchestra from Accrington. The people listened most attentively to the discourse. Tomorrow (Sunday) the Rev. R. McGee will preach. It is upwards of a quarter of a century since Unitarian services were held in Blackburn.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—Mrs. Broadrick has accepted the charge of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, for at any rate three months, and begins her ministry on Sunday, December 3.

Dukinfield.—The Rev. Hugon S. Tayler last Sunday concluded his twenty years' ministry at the Old Chapel.

Dundee.—The thirty-fifth anniversary of the opening of the Unitarian Christian Church, Constitution-road, was celebrated on Sunday, November 19, when special services were conducted by the minister, the Rev. Henry Williamson. In the afternoon a united service of the Sunday-school and the congregation was held, and was well attended.

Halstead. — On Sunday Nov. 19, a special collection was made at the service on behalf of the "Band of Music Fund." In connection with the church is an orchestral band, which leads the singing and renders selections from the compositions of the great Masters in Music. Their assistance is much appreciated by the congregation, as shown from time to time by their applause. The preacher on this occasion was the Rev. G. Carter, who took for the subject of his address, "Music and Words," showing their reciprocal influences, and the advantage which theologians, among others, had taken of the fact. There was a good audience, and a satisfactory collection was taken.

Hinckley.—A very successful sale of work was held on Thursday and Saturday afternoons, November 23 and 25. The proceedings were opened on Thursday by Miss Clephan, of Leicester, Mr. S. Goode taking the chair. Mr. H. Atkins proposed a vote of thanks to Miss Clephan and the minister seconded. The sale realised about £95.

Liverpool: Hamilton-road.—The congregation of this Mission have sustained a great loss in the death on Nov. 18 of Mr. John Davies Thomas, one of their most active and enthusiastic workers, at the early age of 25. He was one of the dominant influences at Hamilton-road, where, for over ten years he acted as Sunday-school teacher, and threw himself heart and soul into all the institutions connected with the place. He had splendid powers of initiative, and organised and successfully carried on many little societies which have made the Mission so attractive to young people. His calling as a school teacher took him from Liverpool to Peakdale, Shirebrook, and Aberdare, and at each of these places he devoted himself freely to the Unitarian movement. His was a long and trying illness, borne with courage and a cheerful faith.

London: Essex Church.—On Wednesday next, at 8.30, at a meeting of the Congregational Society, the Rev. H. Gow, B.A., will read a paper on "The Coming Church," to be followed by conference.

London: Stamford-street.—The Annual Rummage Sale of the Blackfriars Mission was successfully held on Saturday, November 25, and resulted in a sum of about £25 being handed to the treasurer. Many of the parcels sent were without the address of senders, and therefore could not be directly acknowledged.

Manchester: Mosside (Farewell and Presentation).—A soirée was held on Saturday, Nov. 18, to bid farewell to the Rev. Charles Roper and Mrs. Roper, on their removal to Kilburn. A very large number of past and present members of the congregation assembled. The chairman, Mr. J. H. Pimley, in an admirable address referred to the splendid work that had been accomplished during the 17 years of Mr. Roper's ministry, and also of the affectionate regard in which he was held by both young and old. Mr. and Mrs. Roper would carry with them to their new sphere of labour in London the sincerest wish of every member of the congregation for their happiness in the truest sense of the word. Mr. Tyson, one of the founders of the church, then spoke of the great loss the church would sustain in the removal of Mr. Roper. He presented a cheque for £75, the spontaneous offering of the members and friends of the church, and Mr. Roper replied in a most touching and sympathetic speech. Mr. Roper also received a copy of Morley's "Life of Gladstone" from the Young Men's Class, and Mrs. Roper a travelling writing-desk from the Ladies' Sewing Society, and from the Young Women's Social Union a silver photo frame and silver hat-pin stand, while their little daughter was presented with a number of books from the Sunday-school. On Sunday Mr. Roper preached his farewell sermons to large congregations.

Manchester (Pendleton).—On Sunday, November 26, the Rev. N. Anderton, gave the last of a series of Sunday Evening Addresses on "Social Reformers of Last Century," the subject being "William Morris." The services have been very well attended, and especially notable for the large number of strangers who have been attracted by them.

Mansfield.—The Rev. E. I. Fripp preached his farewell sermons at the Old Meeting on Sunday, prior to his removal to Clifton.

Middlesbrough.—The Sunday-school anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, November 12, when sermons were preached by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Holbeck, Leeds. Special hymns and the parable of the mustard seed (music by Hugh Atkins) were prepared and sung by the scholars, assisted by the church choir. On Wednesday evening the annual tea and entertainment were held. Although the weather was very stormy, there was a good attendance at the tea and a large gathering for the entertainment. Two of Mr. Hawkes' plays, "Cinderella" and "Robin Hood," were very well performed by the scholars, and much enjoyed by the large audience present. Songs and recitations filled in the intervals between the plays, and the programme ended with an amusing sketch, entitled "Missed the Train," given by the senior scholars and members of the Guild. Last Sunday evening the second of the People's Services, with popular hymns, was held, the Rev. W. H. Lamselle giving a plain, practical talk. The service was well attended, especially by the young people.

Richmond.—Last Sunday the Rev. Felix Taylor concluded an impressive course of lectures on "Leaders of Thought in the Nineteenth Century," with a rapid but hopeful glance at "The Religious Outlook for the Future." The attendance and the interest shown have been on the whole very encouraging; so much so that Mr. Taylor is planning a similar course for February and March of next year, in which he will attempt to put in fuller outline those frameworks of the larger faith which he could only adumbrate in general terms in the course of a historical survey of other movements. The last word of the course just ended was that "the age of faith is returning, but it demands a new theology." A sacred concert was held in the church on November 15. The women's meeting is as usual straining every nerve for the sale of work which is announced for December 12 at the Priory, Bedford Park (London friends, please notice). The half-yearly congregational meeting was utilised for a discussion on "The Church and its influence on public questions," suggested by the report of the Public Questions Committee of the Provincial Assembly.

Sheffield: Attercliffe Unitarian Mission (Stone-Laying). — Thursday, November 23, was a great day for Sheffield Unitarians, as it was the occasion of the stone-laying ceremony for the new school chapel which is being erected for the Attercliffe Mission in connection with Upper Chapel. The proceedings began with a luncheon, to which a party of fifty-one sat down. At two o'clock a large assembly gathered at the site in Shirland-lane. Centrally situated within a few yards of Attercliffe main road, the building, which will be of brick with stone facings, is to consist of a meeting-room (to accommodate about 250 persons) measuring 40 ft. by 30 ft., and two class-rooms, each of which is 16 ft. square. By means of sliding partitions these may be converted into one large room. Towards the total of £1,700, £1,063 has been either raised or promised by subscriptions. In addition to this, the Yorkshire Unitarian Union have granted £250, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association £50, making a total of £1,363, and leaving about £350 to be raised. Prayer was offered by the Rev. James C. Street, of Shrewsbury, after which the hymn, "God of our fathers, hear our prayer" (announced by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Upper Chapel) was sung. Mr. George Hunt, the treasurer, made a financial statement, and mentioned that they wanted to open the building free of debt. Every effort, he said, must be made to secure that end. The members of Upperthorpe and Upper churches and the Attercliffe Mission were working for a bazaar, which would be held in March. In Attercliffe they had a band of excellent workers. He hoped that when they got into that new room they would be able to gather round them the men and women of the district, and that in the future a strong and vigorous congregation would grow up there. He looked forward to the time when the room would not be sufficient to meet requirements, and when a chapel would have to be built. A collection was made, realising £35 7s. 8d. The stone was then laid by Mrs. R. T. Eadon (one of the oldest members of Upper Chapel), and the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Henry Dawtrey, assistant minister of Upper Chapel, who is curate-in-charge of the Attercliffe Mission. Subsequently the company adjourned to the Zion Congregational School, kindly lent for the occasion, where a well-attended meeting was held, under the presidency of Mr. M. J. Hunter. The ministers present were the Revs. C. J. Street, C. Hargrove, E. Ceredig Jones, Halliwell Thomas, W. Stephens, J. Dale, J. Ellis, J. E. Jenkins, J. S. Mathers, E. E. Jenkins, J. C. Street, A. H. Dolphin, and H. Dawtrey. Mr. G. H. Leigh represented the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and Mr. Henry Lupton the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Brief speeches were insisted upon, but so many people had something to say that the afternoon was well advanced before the meeting was over. The Chairman, who said it was not everybody who had the pleasure and honour of laying a foundation stone of a Unitarian building, reminded them that there had been only two such ceremonies in Sheffield during his life—Channing Hall and Upperthorpe Church. He hoped that that school chapel would do a mighty work at Attercliffe, and wished them God speed. The Rev. C. J. Street, who moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. Eadon for laying the foundation stone, said the new room would be suitable as a Sunday school, and for some years to come, at any rate, as a chapel. The movement marked the beginning of a new era, and he trusted not many months would pass before the building was open for use. Then their friends would be able to transfer their efforts from the Vestry Hall. There was a prospect of the money being raised very shortly, and he hoped there would be a wave of enthusiasm which would spread right through the district. All their congregations in the city were working together, but it would be regarded as a daughter church of the Upper Chapel, and conducted on the same lines as Upper Chapel, without any dogmatic limitations. The financial control would be largely in the hands of the Upper Chapel, but as the cause strengthened, so would home rule gradually develop so far as Attercliffe was concerned. Mr. James Whitehead (chairman of the local committee) seconded the vote of thanks, and Mrs. Eadon replied, hoping that the movement would result in a chapel being built before many years. Mr. Geo. H. Leigh, of Manchester, who represented the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and Mr. Henry Lupton, President of the Yorkshire Union, made encouraging speeches, the former paying a tribute to the devoted work of Mr. Street, whom he had known in Manchester and afterwards in Bolton. Mr. Ernest Parker, superintendent of the Mission Sunday-school, having replied on behalf of the Attercliffe people, Mr. A. J. Hobson extended a welcome to the visitors, and was supported by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. The Revs. C. Hargrove and E. Ceredig Jones replied. The Rev. James C. Street (of Shrewsbury) who moved a vote of thanks to the ministers and deacons of the Zion Congregational Chapel for the loan of their school, said that that movement did not mean that Attercliffe Unitarians were going to fight and stir up strife in any way. They were going to speak the truth they knew, to reveal the life they loved, and to invite the co-operation of many who stood outside all organisations and churches. This would be no centre of antagonism except to wrong and ignorance and bigotry. The motion was seconded and supported by the Rev. H. Dawtrey and the Rev. E. E. Jenkins (formerly assistant minister). The chairman was thanked on the motion of the Rev. J. Ellis (district minister), seconded by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins (Padiham) also a former assistant minister, Mr. Ellis mentioning that it was four years since regular services were first held in Attercliffe. He attributed the success of that movement to the fact that the three Unitarian congregations in Sheffield had worked well and unitedly together. Tea was subsequently served at the Vestry Hall, and a very successful social gathering followed in the evening.

Walmsley (Bolton).—The members of this old chapel have felt for some time that the Sunday-school suffers from want of sufficient accommodation. A Bazaar was held last spring with school extension as its main object. A Sale of Work took place last Saturday, November 25, when the building fund was augmented by about £47 10s. The Rev. E. E. Jenkins presided, and the opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. E. W. Greg, of Egerton Hall, who spoke on the influence and power of the Sunday-school on the young people of a place of worship. The attendance at the opening was very encouraging considering the inclemency of the weather. There were many stalls, and all proved successful.

How to Keep in Health.

ONE of the foremost rules to observe is to take an abundance of liquid nourishment and to drink chiefly between and after meals, and not so much during meal times.

As a health promoting beverage, "Cadbury's Cocoa" is universally admitted to be in the front rank, both the medical faculty and the public being unanimous in appreciation of the physical benefits to be derived from this absolutely pure cocoa.

Cadbury's Cocoa should be taken regularly, especially during the winter season, and on cold and wet days, when a hot cup wards off many a chill.

Everybody likes Cadbury's Cocoa because it is the nicest cocoa. It is the standard of highest purity in cocoa, and is the cheapest and best beverage for family use.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D., who has been minister at Swansea during the last seven years, has accepted the invitation of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to proceed to Wellington, New Zealand, to take charge of the Unitarian congregation recently formed in that city as a result of the visit of the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A. It is believed that there is an excellent prospect of building up a strong Unitarian Church in Wellington. Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones will leave for New Zealand early in the New Year. They will carry with them the best wishes of a large circle of friends in the important work which they are undertaking.

TEN years of Unionist government have come to an end this week with Mr. Balfour's resignation, and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman is Prime Minister. The General Election, which must come at the beginning of the New Year, will be the occasion for a searching review of the policy of the late Government. Then the baleful legacies of that moral tragedy, the South African war, will have to be considered, and the attitude of the new Government towards the question of Chinese labour in the Transvaal, and the enormous increase of military and naval expenditure in this country. The Fiscal controversy will, of course, be prominent, but it will not be allowed to overshadow the questions of Temperance and Education. At the present moment the general feeling throughout the country is probably one of relief that at last a straightforward issue is to be put before the people, and the friends of progress and social reform are filled with a great hope that the new Government will have power to do something effective towards the accomplishment of their ideals.

"WE may hope," says the Methodist Times, in a leading article on the change of Government, "that this event marks the end of the age of political scepticism, immorality, and flaccidity which set in on Mr. Gladstone's death, and was partly traceable even before that. As Methodists we are sworn foes of politics of that temper. Faith in God and the soul, in the reality of the great Redemption, in earnest effort and sacrifice for the common good, in abjuring covetousness and setting human rights above property, in the simple life and high thinking for the public weal, in the brotherhood of men and the equality of all before God; these are principles to which we stand pledged by our religion and which—more clearly acknowledged by the men who will now come into power, than by those who have just quitted it; certainly more deeply believed in by the Progressive Party than by the Reactionary—will now have the opportunity of making themselves felt in our legislature."

WHEN the Kaiser William II. speaks there are English readers prepared to find familiar facts presented in an unfamiliar light. At the same time we must confess to something startling to us in the reference to Russia contained in the Imperial speech with which the German Reichstag has been opened. Russia is in a flame of revolt from East to West; the autocracy is visibly crumbling to pieces. What hope there is for this huge complex of races and nationalities, known geographically as Russia, lies in the thought that within the popular uprising of revolt is to be found also an idea and a directing mind, which will prove equal not only to the overthrow of the old, but to the upbuilding of a new order. But at present the destinies of the people are hidden in stress and agony. Yet the Kaiser speaks as though his neighbour realm were at peace, and needing only to rely on the Tsar. He hopes that the Tsar, as the road-maker of a happy future, will be allowed to win the love and gratitude of his people. There is something dangerous in this resolve not to see things as they are. Certainly there falls on Nicholas of Russia the condemnation due to long generations of corrupt misrule. The present Tsar does but inherit and carry on an evil tradition. So much the apologist may say; but "road-maker"!

WE scan anxiously the reference of the German Emperor to his relations with foreign Powers. The mention of France is not too friendly. At the same time we can rejoice at the settlement of the Morocco difficulty. The veiled allusion to this country also shows a disturbed state of feeling, which we trust may pass away. As for the dream of a great navy, to what end is this? And when will this insensate national rivalry pass away? The peace of Europe does not depend on its armaments, but on the peaceful understanding and intercourse of its peoples. We rejoice to recognise that the most important single party in Germany is avowedly a peace party, opposed alike to militarism and to "big navyism." And we look hopefully to the growth in this and other lands, as well as in Germany, of the faith in and the efforts towards the realisation of Mazzini's vision of the United peoples of Europe. This is of even greater importance for the common weal than the correctness of the relations of governing bureau with governing bureau.

THE latest issue of the official organ of the Garden City Association reports that the present population of the city is about 1,000, compared with a population of about 450 when the estate was purchased. Five miles of new roads have been made, eight miles of water mains laid down, and four miles of sewers; 60 new houses are occupied, 150 others are ready or in course of erection, and land has been let for about 200 in addition. Seven factory sites are let, and three factories have started operations. Gas works were opened on October 10.

THE educational requirements of the new city are being provided for. An educational committee, which included Sir John Gorst and the Bishop of Hereford, has decided on the general lines on which the first public school shall be established. The intention is to provide education of a standard equal to that of the average secondary school, with great improvements in the plan, situation, and architecture of the school, facilities for sports, musical, artistic, and other refining influences, facilities for social intercourse, and the inclusion of all social classes together.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is entitled "Maran Atha," a sermon on the Lord's coming. We quote its conclusion:—

"The day of the Lord is ever at hand. It is to-day, it was yesterday, it will be to-morrow. It breaks now upon this land, now upon that, terrible in dark clouds of judgment, bright in assurance of mercy. Storms of God, they burst upon the nations, and again and again it has seemed to men that there was no more hope and the end of all things was at hand. Then, the storm's fury spent, the air was cleared, and lo! the heaviness and oppression of the past has departed, and a fairer order arises out of the ruin of the old.

"History is full of such examples of doom followed by renovation. At this present moment the Lord has come to Russia. Dark to-day lower the clouds over a great empire which seems tottering to its fall. Across sea and land reach us, out from under the pall of darkness lightning-riven which covers it, sounds of wrong and woe. Old time oppressor, and oppressed for the first time quickened to revolt, meet in deadliest strife, and threat answers threat, and violence is met by violence. Tales of horror are borne to our ears which make good men ask why God permits it and if indeed God is love. Famine and misery, riot and murder, bloody revolt and bloody repression, mutiny of troops and strikes of workers, are the burden of every day's news, It is the Day of judgment. Judgment on centuries of oppression and outrage. Judgment on a government supported by the drunkenness and degradation of the people. Judgment on the rich who have lived by the sweat of the starving poor. Judgment on a church 'increased with goods' and careless of true religion. The wrongs of ages have mounted up till the heap has reached to heaven and vengeance has broken out as from the clouds.

"And, judgment executed, the clouds having poured out their waters, the sun shall shine out and there shall be prosperity and peace such as never was before. For as the old myth teaches, the Lord comes to judge and to redeem. Heaven and earth pass in ruin only to make way for new heavens and a new earth. And God's new is ever better than the old.

"Maran Atha! O Master come! Come and reveal to us here too in England the kingdom of heaven, and reign over us in liberty and righteousness and love!"

THE French Senate on Wednesday passed the law for the Separation of Church and State by 181 votes against 102.

THE address on "Christianity in the Light of Historical Science," delivered by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter at the opening of the Session at Manchester College, Oxford, on Oct. 16, and published the same week in these columns, is now separately issued by the College, with the addition of a number of notes.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—The Committee of the above Association thank you for publishing the 45th Annual Report submitted to its members last October, and your readers may now judge for themselves as to the "deliberate, elaborate, and severe indictment against the McQuaker Trustees in which a bitter animus was abundantly evident," and decide whether "the report as an indictment is utterly disgraceful," as stated in the letter sent you by the Rev. Alexander Webster, minister of the Unitarian Church at Aberdeen. Mr. Webster adds to his other misrepresentations of facts, an insinuation of illegality which may also at once be entirely refuted.

In the new Constitution not one single past privilege of rightful assistance or encouragement to churches is withdrawn, but rather augmented. It is an entire reversion to the basis of the Association in 1861. Its first object then, Mr. Webster states, was "to strengthen the Unitarian societies already existing in Scotland." But that was not its main object, nor were the methods to be adopted in its work limited to "grants to churches," as such an intention is never as much as hinted at.

The whole sense and essence of the actually stated purpose of the Constitution of 1861 has been altogether transferred to that of 1905, and it is exactly opposite in spirit and fact to that read into it by Mr. Webster.

The object, then, was "to seek out those who hold Unitarian principles without having enjoyed the opportunity of joining a Unitarian congregation, and when a sufficient number of such persons can be found in one place, to induce them to form a society." That is again the main purpose of our Association, and to which the greatest energy will be devoted.

Mr. Webster has also said, "the churches are now cut off from the Association." This is not the fact. Each church has still the right of representation on the Committee according to Rule 3, just the same as ever, while for every ten members joining the Association from any church or district, a representative on the Committee is also allowed, which surely provides an equal and ample opportunity to guide and assist in its affairs.

As to Mr. Webster's statement regarding the church buildings at Kilmarnock having been secured to the congregation for another year, it is not the case that this was done at the annual meeting "in opposition to an unwarranted decision of the Committee of the S.U.A. to sell it."

A special offer was made at this meeting, for the first time, to defray all charges on the property for a year. This offer, for this period, was embodied in a resolution, which, however, also contained distinct approval of the Committee's whole action in the matter, and became the finding of the meeting.

In conclusion, we have no intention of further encroaching on your space in a controversial war, and have only done this much to defend our Association and its proposed work against the unwarranted aspersions of the Rev. Alexander Webster, and to allow those interested in the progress and prosperity of our Scottish work an opportunity of exercising an independent judgment on our aims and methods.

JAS. G. DAVIDSON,
Hon. Secretary, S.U.A.

THE CHRISTIAN SPIRIT.

SIR,—I am glad that my review of Mr. Balmforth's book has given him the opportunity of clearing up an important point. As he suggests, there was some excuse for my misunderstanding. But the main thing is not how I misunderstood, but what Mr. Balmforth's actual view is, which, now that he has pointed it out, I can see was his real meaning.

May I in turn explain that I am absolutely innocent of any wish to "exclude devout agnostics" from religious fellowship. Oh! this wearisome business of everlasting explanation, all due to our having to explain away our dogmatic name. We are always oscillating between two antagonistic and equally impossible positions: (1) That we stand for certain dogmatic opinions in contradistinction to other churches; and (2) that we stand simply for negative freedom. And we refuse to see that the only way to transcend this opposition, and get out of this intellectual dilemma, is to say with Dr. John Hunter in his "Coming Church," that a church should stand for the Christian Spirit. All this would be implied and made secure if we were simply "Free Christians." A "spirit" is the outcome of the whole of a man's personality—intellect, feeling and will—and is therefore the true medium of religious expression; whereas dogma, or freedom from dogma, is the outcome principally of intellect. The Christian Spirit would exclude no "devout" man.

Cardiff, Dec. 4. W. WHITAKER.

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. G. A. King, is good enough to designate as begging the question the simple, practical experience to which I referred as to the preservation of peace by preparation to maintain it. Universal brotherhood is too far off to be within the range of practical politics, and it is very satisfactory to find that in Australia every schoolboy receives some military training and practice with a miniature rifle, and that the extension of this to all fit male adults is being seriously contemplated. So far is all this from engendering the war spirit there that it has brought hostile politicians to meet upon a common platform. For the physique, no less than for the morals of this nation, and, indeed for our common humanity, it is to be devoutly hoped that Lord Roberts will succeed in his patriotic efforts to promote universal military training. This would do much to extinguish class prejudice, elevate the whole tone of the people, and promote the true brotherhood of mutual self-sacrifice.

STUDIES IN STOICISM.

IV.

STOIC THOUGHT OF DEATH.

IN my last article I pointed out what wide fluctuations in insight and spiritual temper are revealed in the writings of the Stoics, fluctuations ranging from the most glaring optimism to a gloomy and chilling pessimism. Seneca, for instance, varies from the most ardent conviction of the goodness of life to the sentiment, "not to be born is the happiest lot of all, and the nearest thing to this is to die as quickly as possible." In estimating Stoic thought on death and the future life we must remember this liability to spiritual fluctuation, and be prepared to find a Stoic speaking confidently on the subject at one time and somewhat more doubtfully at another. It seems to me that it is a mistake to say, as Dr. Rendall does, that when Seneca, for instance, speaks confidently about immortality, "he illustrates the tendency of Roman Stoicism to make at least verbal concessions to the popular belief in some survival after death." The truth seems rather to be that the whole of Stoical philosophy led logically to the conclusion of the immortality of the soul, but that, since the real grasping of such a fact depends on what we may call "spiritual condition" as well as on logic, the Stoic varied in his discernment of the necessity and the reality of life beyond death. At one time he speaks with hesitation and some doubt, at another with triumphant assurance. With most men to-day belief in immortality issues from the perception that they are living in a world-order that is rational and good, the inner Reality of which is spirit, infinite, eternal, which they learn to trust in this life, and for what is beyond. So the Stoic believed in a world-order rational and good, in spirit, infinite and eternal as its inner Reality. The material universe was the outer aspect or form of expression which this Reality gave to itself. The abiding essence of Nature was God, a Spirit Power, the Creative Energy whence sprang our human spirits, the Providence that guided and trained them towards certain goals of moral perfection during their earthly sojourn. From the fact of God as Eternal Spirit, from the fact that the human spirit is His offspring, from His providential goodness, from the moral ends He places before men, from His fatherly interest and guidance, all of which the Stoic held tenaciously, the immortality of the human soul seems logically to follow. Had no further word been written by the Stoics on the subject we should have been warranted in saying that this conclusion and no other was the true outcome of their system. But they have left us much on the subject, referring to it sometimes with hesitation, sometimes with deep assurance, according as their spirits rose to the realisation of this last demand of their whole philosophy.

Man's kinship with God is thus expressed by Epictetus: "From God have descended the seeds not only to my father and grandfather, but to all beings which are generated on the earth, and particularly to rational beings—for these only by their nature are formed to have communion with God, being by means of reason conjoined with Him. Why should not such a man call himself . . . . a son of God?" That man sprang from God and is of the same spiritual nature, is basal in all Stoic teaching. How can such a thing be anything but immortal as God is immortal? Seneca in many passages speaks in no uncertain language on the point. He not only insists on the fact of life beyond death, but has certain well-defined conceptions as to what it will be like, which can be gleaned by the careful reader of his pages. To God he says: "We shall go when our souls shall be delivered from the slavery of our flesh." "The good mind came from Heaven, and to Heaven it must return, and there enjoys a kind of felicity which a pure and virtuous mind enjoys in some degree even upon earth." Seneca says that the general consensus of opinion that in the future state there will be a distribution of rewards and punishments, has great weight with him, though he advances no arguments on his own account to justify this expectation. He believes, however, that life beyond death is but the continuation of an existence that is eternal. "The day we fear as our last is but the birthday of our eternity, and it is the only way to it, so that what we fear as a rock proves to be but a port, in many cases to be desired, never to be refused; and he that dies young has only made a quick voyage of it." And again he says: "This Life is only a prelude to Eternity, where we are to expect another original state of things. . . . That which we call Death is but a pause or suspension, and, in truth, a progress to Life, only our thoughts look downward upon the body, and not forward upon things to come." These quotations are taken from Seneca's treatise on a "Happy Life." From them we conclude that Seneca, in certain moods at least, believed firmly in life's triumph over the dissolution of the body, that the human soul is immortal and eternal, that after death it retains its consciousness and may enjoy felicity, and probably reaped its due punishment and reward.

In his "Consolations to Marcia" there are several passages that further disclose Seneca's ideas as to what the life beyond death is like. A conscious life is implied in the following: "When the time shall arrive for the world to be brought to an end that it may begin its life anew, all the forces of nature will perish in conflict with one another . . . then we also, the souls of the blest, and the heirs of eternal life . . . shall be changed into our old elements. Happy is your son, Marcia, in that he already knows this." Knowledge implies consciousness and a continuation of personal existence. But Seneca, it will be seen, complicates matters by bringing in the Stoic conception of some future general dissolution and reorganisation of all the world's elements, which event seems to divide the future life again into two sections, that enjoyed before and that after the event. This conception of a general cataclysm, which is very similar to that evolved by the Jews, remained very vague and indistinct with the Roman Stoics, and is nowhere worked out by them with any thoroughness. In general, the division of life beyond death into two stages is ignored, and the Stoic touches on the problem of immortality without reference to it. It is obviously ignored in a passage like the following, taken from the same discourse: "Your son has passed beyond the border of the country where men are forced to labour; he has reached deep and everlasting peace. He feels no fear, no want, no anxiety. . . . He has at last taken up a position from which nothing can dislodge him, where nothing can make him afraid."

Seneca's mood varies it is true, and there are times when he halts in doubt, and times when he feels he has nothing to affirm as to a future life, and is content to realise that his lot will be disposed by God. Thus: "What death is we know not, and it were rash to condemn what we do not understand. There is nothing immortal. What arrogance it is then . . . that man alone should expect to live for ever. It is unjust not to allow unto the Giver the power of disposing of his own bounty." Seneca, obviously, does not take up one consistent attitude on the subject.

In the writings of Epictetus the problem of immortality occupies an unimportant position as regards the space allotted to it. But when he discusses the question he gives a decisive answer. Death, he says, means "going to nothing terrible, but to the place from which you came, to your friends and kinsmen, to the elements; what there was in you of fire goes to fire, of earth to earth, of water to water. There is no Hades, no Acheron . . . but all is full of gods and spirits." A little later he puts the direct question, "Shall I exist?" And his answer is worth thought. "Death is . . . a change not from the state which now is to that which is not, but to that which is not now. Shall I then no longer exist? You will not exist, but you will be something else, of which the world now has need; for you also came into existence not when you chose, but when the world had need of you." The first sentence is a decisive statement that death is not a passage from being to not being. It is a change to another form of being. In the following sentences he declares that one will not exist, that is in the sense in which he possesses existence in this present life, but he becomes something else, exists in another form, according to the demand of nature. All that Epictetus seems certain of is this continuation of life, the conditions and forms of which lie beyond his knowledge, and are determined by the purpose that gives itself expression in the one world order.

Marcus Aurelius seems to have greater difficulty in rising to the conviction of life beyond death. The fact of death really depresses him, though he declares it ought to be met with cheerfulness. It is tragic and saddening. And this prevents him from looking at it steadily and rising above it. Death remains for him a "mystery of Nature." It is a "dissolution of the elements of which every living being is compounded." It cannot really be an evil, of that he feels assured, "for it is according to Nature, and nothing is evil which is according to Nature." But it is not a good, for it makes a man no better. "Death, life, pleasure, pain . . . make us neither better nor worse. Therefore, they are neither good nor evil." Death has its place in the divine order of Nature. Therefore, he bends his mind to the belief that "All that is from the gods is full of providence," and cries: "Everything harmonises with me which is harmonious to thee, O Nature.''

Immortality, I believe to be, as I have said, the rational and logical outcome of the whole system of Stoic thought. There are times, as we have seen, when its representatives realise this, and times when it seems too high, and they can hardly attain unto it. The time was ripe for fuller conviction and a more decisive word. This fuller conviction comes with Christianity. The more decisive word was spoken by Christianity. Christianity came proving the continuance of life beyond death by appealing to the resurrection of Christ. But it had another effect not depending on the validity of that proof. It came with a more tenacious grip on the central realities of God's existence, God's love, and God's intimate connection with man. And through the heightened consciousness of these, the firmer conviction of the immortality of the soul was gained. The main basis was not the occurrence of a certain historical event, but this insight into and grasp on the reality of God's being, and the relationship man bears to Him. Since this was so, the coming of Christianity into the realms pervaded by Stoic thought and belief, meant the carrying of that system of thought and belief to its logical conclusions, and, in particular, a renewed insistent emphasis on the immortality of the soul, towards which Stoicism had been feeling its way. In this, as in so many ways, the Stoic spirit was but purified and deepened and impelled towards its own true goals—the spirit of repose in God, and His divine purpose in which there was nothing but good—the spirit voiced in the earlier days of Stoicism by the hymn of Cleanthes :—

"Lead me, O Zeus, and thou O Destiny,
The way that I am bid by you to go.
To follow I am ready ; if I choose not,
A wretched man am I, and still must follow."

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

"THE NEEDS OF MAN."

DR. WINSLOW HALL'S little volume entitled "The Needs of Man"* is one of the latest contributions to the growing literature of "the Simple Life." Modestly esteeming his pleasant essays as, in the whole, no more than "a book of suggestions," the author deprecates criticism, and, indeed, criticism of any unfriendly purport would not be fair. The author has enjoyed the preparation of his pages, has fully expounded his mind, and wears his heart upon his sleeve. It is only becoming to us to welcome such an outspoken expression of sincere conviction in matters of faith, social, economical, and religious.

Dr. Winslow Hall appears to us to be at his best when he is treating of "bodily" needs of man (to adopt his own classification) such as come within the view of his professional survey. The list he compiles of such needs is in itself suggestive—food, cleanliness, coverings, land, work, rest, pain, and death. The inclusion of pain and death in the scheme of life as beneficial necessities illustrates the optimistic temper of the essayist. Readers who are unable to follow the Doctor in his belief in "the scientific certainty" of immortality "we owe to F. W. H. Myers," will yet profit by his cheerfulness and courage, which are independent of such a support.

In subsequent sections of his book the Doctor is no less resolute and unconventional. For instance, he reckons "sin" along with "love" as the two "moral needs" of man. He holds that there is a benignant necessity in sin. "Evil," he says, "is the doorsill of heaven." "Sin is the rough-hewer of our moral nature." "A calm inquiry shows us that sin, however proper our endeavour to eliminate it may be, is yet, in spite of itself, beneficial."

We are grateful to the Doctor for feeling that no account of religion is complete which omits to have concern with Beauty. Indeed, it appears to us like the play of Hamlet with the prince left out. Our perception of beauty, says the author, brings us into rapt union with the Infinite.

One of the best essays in the book is that preaching "Rest." The author recommends Humour to the restless. "No one with a sense of humour can have failed to feel what an inestimable boon it is ; what a sweetener of drudgery, what a quickener of work, what a ready delver to those precious veins of feeling that give impetus and strength and unity to life. Therefore, let possessors of this motley sense exalt and foster it. Laughter, so that it be reverent and kind, is puissant as a tonic." The author, we perceive, has a religious awe of sleep, and he praises the recuperative power of silence. He thinks that four weeks' annual holiday should be assured by law to all, whether statesmen or ploughmen. The greatest thing for him when he is away by the sea-shore or elsewhere in natural solitudes is the sense of the presence of God.

The essays on "Cleanliness," and on "Coverings," cannot be read unprofitably. In "Cleanliness" occurs the following :—"Colds are not caught in open air ; they are bred in hot rooms ; and we should speak of catching hot rather than of catching cold. The craving for skin warmth is responsible for much of our modern disease and inefficiency. It grows with every attempt to satisfy it ; and in gratifying the skin, which, though it can feel, is relatively unimportant, we poison the lungs, which, though they cannot feel, are immeasurably more important."

What a delicate instinct insists upon the caution given here :—"In using water for cleansing purposes, care should be taken to foul as little of it as possible, seeing that Nature has to work long and hard before she can purify it again for the use of man."

Dr. Winslow Hall enjoys life, there is no room for doubt, and enjoys, too, the exercise of writing. He makes us like him as we read his book. There is much useful suggestion, much stimulating food for cheerfulness. A great part of the book, nevertheless, has no other interest than attaches to a personal expression of opinion touching mysteries concealed from all. This part, to us, seems of little value ; but we are grateful—we can be no less—for the writer's buoyancy and valiancy, his breezy spirit and shrewd sense and good companionship, which will not be found unhelpful upon the way.

MR. BROOKE'S SHAKESPEARE LECTURES.*

THESE ten lectures, delivered at University College, London, under the Stopford Brooke lectureship, have been eagerly looked for in their published form. They make a book which is likely to be even more popular than Mr. Brooke's studies of Tennyson and Browning.

There is neither preface nor introduction, no general study of the poet's art such as we find in the earlier volumes, no separate study of Shakespeare's treatment of nature, or of his philosophy of life. Whatever is said on these and kindred subjects is introduced in connection with one or other of the plays.

Thus in the lecture on "Midsummer Night's Dream," in describing the wood near Athens, Mr. Brooke notices how keen was Shakespeare's enjoyment of nature, with what an observant eye he watched her doings, and that his eye for colour was as clear as Browning's ; and in connection with the imaginative love poetry of "Romeo and Juliet" the "modern quality" is mentioned, which "combines human passion with the doings of nature." Shakespeare's "realism of the poor" is noticed in the first lecture.

"It is said that Shakespeare did not care for the common folk. He did not think them fit to govern, but he had a true sympathy for them, an affectionate intimacy with their manners, their humour, and their views of life."

In the lecture on Coriolanus there is eloquent protest against the almost traditional supposition that Shakespeare here shows contempt for the mob.

"Shakespeare was certain, with that brain of his, to see all sides of the question, and to represent them." But in demonstrating Shakespeare's sympathy with the struggle of the people, and so proving that here as elsewhere Shakespeare gives us even-handed justice in his dramatic treatment, Mr. Brooke seems to overshoot the mark, and obscures the poet's sympathy with Coriolanus. "No one can help seeing that Shakespeare did not love Coriolanus nor approve of his conduct" is only a half truth. Shakespeare was sure with that big heart of his to feel with all parties in any strife—to feel with Coriolanus as with the people, with the proud Roman mother Volumnia, and with the anxious Roman wife Virgilia, as well as with the "widows in Corioli" and "mothers that lack sons." How could Shakespeare have given us such women as Volumnia and Virgilia, had he not shared their love for Coriolanus ?

Mr. Brooke gives a lifelike portrait of Volumnia the mother, and his sketch of the wife Virgilia is ideal in its interpretation of her "gracious silence." A further touch of reality would have been added had he perceived that her "quietness" as of "a forest lake" is not maintained without effort, that the tender-hearted wife is somewhat tried by the martial valour of her mother-in-law.

* "On Ten Plays of Shakespeare" (Midsummer Night's Dream, Romeo and Juliet, Richard II., Richard III., Merchant of Venice, As You Like It, Macbeth, Coriolanus, A Winter's Tale, Tempest). By Stopford A. Brooke, Author of "Tennyson : his Art and Relation to Modern Life," "The Poetry of Robert Browning," &c. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

Virgilia fails to take either pride or pleasure in Volumnia's vision of the "bloody brow" of their warrior at Corioli. The atmosphere of domestic peace is somewhat disturbed when Valeria enters to pay her visit. (Act I., scene 3.)

With cheerful tact the visitor comments on her friend's needlework, tells an anecdote of Virgilia's little son, and then tries to tempt her out-of-doors. Valeria, it seems, urges Virgilia to lay aside her stitchery and "play the idle huswife," not because she herself is "idle," but that Virgilia needs a change, and the inducement offered is a visit to a sick lady, not "the movement of Rome." Virgilia remains steadfast in her refusal to leave home, and her friend, still tactful, carries off the mother-in-law, whilst Virgilia is left to recover her equanimity alone.

Valeria's rôle as tactful friend is a significant one, and is quite missed by Mr. Brooke, whilst "the patrician note" and her interest in "the movement of Rome," are just what Shakespeare has omitted in his picture of Valeria. In history she is an illustrious lady, whose family had served Rome not only as warriors but also as statesmen and peacemakers, and had been distinguished by prudence and wisdom as well as by valour. She herself served Rome as peacemaker at the crisis of the Coriolanus story, for it was she who by her wisdom—"divine impulse," Plutarch calls it—made the suggestion of the embassy to Coriolanus of his mother, wife, and child. This public share in the story Shakespeare has omitted, whilst he has enlisted Valeria's capacity of wise statesmanship in the humble service of quieting the jarred nerves of the anxious wife. The illustrious Roman lady can gossip and chaff, and "the noble sister of Publicola" is also "dear Valeria," Virgilia's tactful friend. It is one of those characteristic touches that impel one to add "dear Shakespeare"!

The English Historical plays selected by Mr. Brooke are "Richard III." and "Richard II." two plays which, lying near together in order of production, are far apart in style, and form respectively the conclusion and the introduction to the series.

"We have, in these eight plays, not only eight separate plays, five of which are complete within themselves, but one single drama also, with a unity of its own, with one subject, with one end to which they look forward, and with one divine justice in them, slowly working out its laws to their fulfilment. And the years over which this mighty drama extends are nearly ninety years. I wish it were possible to act them all in the same day. It would then be seen that Richard III. wound up that web of fate which began to be woven in Richard II., and which, weaving on through Henry IV., V., and VI., contains in its living tapestry so great and various a representation of human life as never yet was brought together and harmonised by any genius in the modern world; of life in all classes of society; of life passing from the most tragic sorrows to the most comic, even the rudest pleasures; life in the streets of London, in the country, on the battlefield, in the council, at the court, and the ale house, in the camps of France and England, by the dying bed of kings, and in the garret where Falstaff passed away with a broken heart."

The national significance of these plays is emphasised and their origin in Shakespeare's patriotism. "He made it clear that the war was caused by the ambitions, jealousies, hatreds of great princes and nobles who remembered only themselves, and forgot the welfare of the people."

Mr. Brooke wishes it were possible to act the series in one day. We might extend the hyperbole, and wish there were audiences in every town wishful to see such a series once a year! Shakespeare's native town has on more than one occasion seen an approximation to the complete series, in 1901 five of the eight plays, and this year four being given on successive evenings with great success.

Whilst the studies of the two English historical plays and of Coriolanus are full of interest, it is perhaps the interpretations of the romantic plays and their heroines that are most delightful.

Juliet, Portia, Rosalind, Hermione, Perdita, Miranda, all live for us again. We may each have our special favourite in this group of favourites. It seems as if the writer himself had taken most delight in the joyous Rosalind, and has in her case, perhaps, brought us nearest to Shakespeare.

Joyousness is the key-note of Rosalind's character, as it is of the whole play of "As You Like It," and according to Mr. Brooke it is the dominant note of Shakespeare's own spirit—the key-note of his work as a whole.

In her world Rosalind is first, "not because she is isolated from the other characters, but because she adds life to all that is living in them. She does not put out their light, but kindles it into a brighter flame of character. They burn all the brighter for her influence. A touch from her makes them reveal themselves." And Rosalind is the heroine of the play 'As You Like It.'"

May we not take this to mean that this Rosalind is a heroine after Shakespeare's own heart? Mr. Brooke takes the title to imply that we may take the play as we like it—its mirth or its seriousness—in whatever way we please. It may also imply that in giving dramatic form to the popular contemporary romance of "Rosalind," with its prosy, sentimental, unreal narrative, and its prosy, sentimental, unreal heroine, Shakespeare, no longer fettered as he had been in the historical plays, by historical fact or probability, shaped story and heroine just as he liked. In the forest of Arden Shakespeare could picture life as he liked. Here at least he could establish the rule of "kindness ever nobler than revenge," so that gentleness should force, more than force move men to gentleness. What matter if Duke Frederick's repentance, and that of Oliver, too, be sudden and improbable? What matter that in Oliver's case, as Mr. Brooke complains, "Shakespeare ought not to have made him so very bad in the beginning if he was to be so good in the end?" Shakespeare evidently liked to reform unpromising characters and to reform them by gentle means. And given a Rosalind, what is impossible or even improbable? "Her charm, her nature," as Mr. Brooke says, is to be "the resolver of all tangles, the uplifter of all that is best in each character." It is in reference to Rosalind also that we read "Men have eyes to see in joy; in half-cynic sorrow they are blind."

Without any separate study of Shakespeare's character or philosophy, we are made to feel throughout the influence of his bright vitality, his belief that life is good, that even in tragedy good prevails over evil. Professor Bradley's fine book on "Shakespearean Tragedy" has this year, no doubt, set many a Shakespeare lover pondering more deeply on the tragedies, and on the nature and mystery of tragedy in life and art. Mr. Brooke's contribution to this subject is an important one, though indirect rather than direct. Professor Bradley bids us remember that the tragic aspect of life is only one aspect, that we cannot arrive at Shakespeare's whole dramatic way of looking at the world from his tragedies alone. Mr. Brooke reminds us that the dominant spirit in Shakespeare is, in spite of his tragedies, cheerfulness, not gloom, that "the central brightness, the sportive happiness at the root of Shakespeare's character and art lasted when he had emerged from tragedy."

"He owed to the deep-seated joyfulness in him the sanity of his judgment of life, the unbiassed justice with which he weighed its good and evil in the balance, the clear sight he had of physical and moral evil. It is the cheerful poet who sees the gloom most lucidly, most wisely."

BY A MINISTER.

XXX.

VALENTINUS reminds me that I have still to show that the humour found in the Old Testament is not entirely absent from the New. The action of the latter is so grave, the feeling so exalted, that the play of lighter thought might well be wholly wanting; but it flickers here and there, like sunlight in a forest, and lurks in unsuspected places. It meets us first in some of the recorded sayings of Christ. Take, for instance, those which connect themselves with the ministry of John the Baptist. Mark the quiet irony in the question: What went ye out to see? and in those which follow: A reed shaken with the wind? A man clothed in soft raiment? See it also in the pointed similitude drawn from the rival games of children in the market-places, calling to their fellows. It appears again in the embarrassing inquiries put to those who thought that they could with impunity "entangle him in his talk": The baptism of John, whence was it? By whom do your children cast them out? Whose is this image and superscription? Have ye not heard what David did? Can ye make the sons of the bride-chamber fast? Whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that sanctifieth the gold? How doth David call him Lord? If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? Did not he that made the outside, make the inside also? Doth not each one of you loose his ox or his ass from the stall? Ought not this woman to have been loosed from this bond? Ye can discern the face of the sky, can ye not discern the signs of the times? It is found also in half-playful remonstrance addressed to friends: Which of you by being anxious can add a cubit unto his stature? Can the blind lead the blind? Do men gather grapes of thorns? Will he give them a stone? a serpent? a scorpion? Where are the nine? Are there not twelve hours in the day? And in the freer rallying of such questions as: Art thou the teacher of Israel, and understandest not these things? From whom do the kings of the earth receive toll or tribute? from their sons, or from strangers? Whence are we to buy bread, that these may eat? If ye do good to them that do good to you, what thank have ye? Does he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? The irony of strongly marked contrast is also to be observed. Over against the Pharisee stands the Publican; against the Priest the Samaritan; to the labourers who worked all day are opposed those who worked one hour; to the son who promised and obeyed not, the son who promised not and obeyed; to the prodigal the elder brother. Sometimes the contrast is that of verbal antithesis: The last shall be first; The humble shall be exalted; The meek shall inherit; Death has its wide gate and broad way, the gate of life is narrow, the way straitened; Solomon in all his glory is not as proudly arrayed as the humblest lily; The poor widow who casts in little, castsin more than the rich who cast in much; Judgment, mercy, and faith are held by some to be of less account than the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin; From a host not even oil for the head, from a stranger precious ointment for the feet. More searching are the comparisons of hot indignation: They killed the prophets, and ye build their sepulchres; Ye are as the tombs which appear not; Ye touch not the burdens grievous to be borne with one of your fingers; Ye are they which devour widows' houses; Full well do ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your tradition; If the light within thee be darkness, how great is that darkness; He that is without sin, let him first cast a stone at her; Whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath; If these shall hold their peace, the stones will cry out. There are sayings which have been misunderstood because the subtlety of their humour has not been seized: Woman, what have I to do with thee? It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs; He shall receive a hundred-fold now in this time . . . . with persecutions; It is enough (said of the two swords); Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; Give for alms those things which are within. It is the spark of humour that attracts us in the sayings which have become proverbial in our own language—those which speak of the hiding of light, the burying of a talent, the cleansing of a platter, the mote and the beam, the gnat and the camel, the rich man and the eye of a needle, the new piece on an old garment, the house on the sand, the unfinished tower, whited sepulchres, crumbs from the rich man's table, serving two masters, wolves in sheep's clothing, pearls before swine, faith that moves mountains, salt that has lost its savour. And who, remembering the occasions on which they were spoken, has not felt the playful sadness of the words: Physician, heal thyself; Soul, take thine ease; Or even as this publican; Make to yourselves purses that wax not old; Let him that is in the field not return back to take his cloke; Sleep on now and take your rest?

St. Paul's humour is his own, severe, caustic, strongly personal, yet never selfish. He is bitter, without being spiteful; it is his heart that is wounded, not his pride. He is too much grieved to feel the satirist's delight in his own wit. Under open attack, and still more under unworthy suspicion, the keenest sarcasm flashes from him, but it is the sarcasm of reproach, and not of scorn. His irony often takes the form of half-serious, half-amused self-disparagement. He must be borne with as a fool, he is a spectacle to men and angels, one born out of due time, buffeted by Satan. Smarting under unfair comparison with some of the Twelve, he speaks of them with piqued reverence as Their Pre-eminences; full of indignation against false apostles, he compliments them as angels of darkness transformed into angels of light. More genial is the humour of passages like the following: It is not thou that bearest the root, but the root thee; Hath not the potter power over the clay? Ye would have plucked out your eyes and given them to me; See with how large letters I have written unto you; Though you should have ten thousand pedagogues, yet have ye not many fathers. Very frequently he plays with the sense of Greek words, as in 1 Cor. ix. 27; 2 Cor. xii. 13; Gal. i. 6, v. 12; Philem. 11, 18, 20; Rom. i. 20, 28, 31, ii. 1, xii. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 31; 2 Cor. iii. 2, vi. 10, iv. 8; 2 Thess. iii. 11; 1 Tim. v. 6, 13; 2 Tim. i. 18; Phil. iv. 3 (if the word for "yoke-fellow" was also a proper name.) In Heb. v. 8, there is very happy play upon words of similar sound.

More illustrations come to my mind from these and other New Testament writings; but I did not set out to write a treatise, and my list is long enough. I should be wanting, perhaps, in sense of humour, if I made it longer.

THERE is promise of a capital audience on Wednesday evening at the dramatic performance in aid of the Blackfriars Mission, to be given at St. George's Hall, under Mr. Herbert Lawford's direction.

PROFESSOR BENOYENDRA NATH SEN, of Calcutta, who attended the meetings of the International Council at Geneva as the representative of the Brahmo Samajes of India, is now in England. He will remain in this country for a few weeks, possibly until the end of January. Prof. Sen would like to see something of the life and work of our churches, and he will be pleased to visit a few congregations, to preach on the Sunday or speak at a week-evening gathering, so far as his time will allow, if proper arrangements are made. Professor Sen is one of the most distinguished and eloquent representatives of the Brahmo Samaj movement in India. Applications for his services should be addressed to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

A DAY OF REMEMBRANCE.

Two most important ceremonial occasions in the German Evangelical Church are the Festival of the Dead, celebrated always on the last Sunday before Advent, and the Day of Penitence, a few days earlier. The symbolism of this late November Sunday closely resembles the All Saints' Day of the Catholic Church, and witnesses to the insistent claims of certain memories and emotions for some formal recognition. For days beforehand the country-folk are busy gathering all manner of berries, leaves, and cones; the forest trees yield up their fragrant pine branches. With these the groundwork of numberless wreathes is formed, and to these is added, by way of final decoration many coloured artificial roses. Bearing these trophies of the woodlands, at once their merchandise and their ornament, the peasants flock into the towns, and the townspeople buy. Then, early on the festal Sunday, people, young and old, throng to the cemetery—the so beautifully named Friedhof—to lay their offerings on the graves of friends. So, all day long, the stream of men and women and children continues, till the whole God's acre looks one great garden of charming colour. Some of the graves have imposing monuments, but to-day their costly pretension is hidden under the dark-green boughs. Here is a little mound with cheapest wooden cross and simply a name; the protecting wall is low, made of little shapeless stones, only the rough chippings of the quarry. To-day it, too, is decked with fresh green, sanctified anew by loving thought. Here, too, it must be said, are bare, chill mounds—no flowers, no leaves. Have all friends forgotten, or are all departed? But these are few; the most are adorned, and round them linger family groups, gaining a graver charm for their holiday from this their remembrance of the absent ones.

It is a beautiful ceremonial, full of grand and tender thought. Here are people who rarely think an abstract thought; simply they live and suffer and enjoy with that more or less of success which is given to human effort. Here are faces worn with the experience of many years; the romance of youth is not in their figure, nor the brilliance in their eye. Witnesses yet they also to the imperishable romance of life. Let the day pass. Old memories, brought out for an hour, must again be shut away, and life goes on as before. As before, because before, also, there lay latent in the heart that of which the flower festival is open suggestion—the intimate communion of the living and the dead. This solidarity of the ages is surely some part of the thing symbolised, this linking of the generations. And yet these symbols always mean more than those sharpest, meagrest symbols, words, will readily express. As the November day wears to its close, its lights are low and soft, here and there wreaths of light mist rise from the lowland by the river. The people pass and talk, some, the little children, run and chatter, but the faces of men and women are touched with some inexpressible serenity. Over all, the broad clouds of a late autumn afternoon are as the shadowing of the wings of doves.

OBITUARY.

MR. ALEXANDER M'LAREN.

BY the death of Mr. A. M'Laren, of Glasgow, the cause of Unitarianism in Scotland has lost one of its most zealous, earnest, and sincere adherents and advocates. Those who knew him most intimately alone could fully appreciate his whole-hearted devotion to liberal religious progress; indeed, to progressive liberalism in every form. He had strong opinions on questions of both principle and method, and he had the courage to strongly express them, even if he stood alone. But far more freely than many who differed from him did he give himself, his time, and his means for the advance of the faith he cherished. For the greater part of his life he was a tireless helper, by word and deed, of forward, though unpopular, causes. He was a native of Kilmarnock, but came to Glasgow more than thirty years ago. He then abandoned the trade of his youth, and became, not merely a bookseller, but a book reader and lover, and ultimately an author. During recent years he published two volumes of verse, which were well received by both the public press and a large circle of readers. To-day his name appears well-placed on the long roll of Scottish minor poets; and his simple, unaffected, manly songs have brought hope and peace and glad courage to not a few fainting hearts and weary, troubled lives.

But he was no less widely known and respected as a preacher and practiser of the larger hope and broader faith of our time. He was for many years a member of our East-End Church in Glasgow; but he was ready and willing to serve all as he could. By his lectures and addresses he was well known and ever welcome to most of our Scottish congregations, and quite lately he was one of the most earnest and helpful friends of an effort to make inter-congregational meetings more frequent and hearty than in the past. Altogether, his life and talents were freely and generously given to what he believed to be true and good. His experience was often hard, and latterly his sufferings were great. But he was cheerfully true to his hope and conviction to the last. Indeed, the spirit and conduct of his life were in harmony with his own words: "Faithfulness is hard; but we must try to keep the faith. The gain is beyond us."

J. F.

HERE is another bit from Miss Newling's Children's Column of last week, on "Heroes in the Making," for which there was not room:—

A lady was once watching her father skate on a small lake in front of the house. The ice gave, she saw him go under. Did she fly for help? No, she fainted at the window, and by the time she came to herself it was too late to help him.

I never heard any particulars of this case, but suspect that the lady was in the habit of merely saying, "What a pity," or "I am so sorry for you," when she saw anybody in a difficulty, instead of actively helping them out of their troubles. If she had trained herself to act, instead of only feeling sorry, it seems hardly likely that she would have fainted at that critical moment.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

STEPHEN sat on the rug before the fire. It was too dark to read, so his book lay on the floor beside him. But he had no mind to read, for he was to go to-morrow for the first time, to a large school far from his home. The door opened and his mother came in. He got up and pulled forward an easy chair and a footstool for her; but when she sat down and held his hand he thought he saw by the light of the fire that she had been crying. She and he were everything to each other, for he was her only child, and his father had died when he was quite little. Seeing her sad face, he gently sat down on her knee, and put his arms round her neck, and his cheek against hers, and said, "Mother did you cry because I am going away?" She answered, "Yes, dear, it is very sad to me."

Stephen felt half ashamed, for he wanted to go to school very much. After a pause he said, "But it's all right for me to go now, you know, Mother dear, for I am big. Are you afraid I shan't do well? I'll try my best. And think of all the play, and all the boys! I expect we shall have larks!"

"I am not afraid that you will not have larks, Stephen; but I hope you will be steady, and not allow yourself to be led away into naughty larks."

"Oh, not really naughty, of course, Mother; but fun isn't naughty."

"No, not because it is fun; but schoolboys' fun is very apt to be unkind; and I should be sorry if you joined in fun that was cruel or unkind to others. Boys who love fun often don't in the least realise how much they hurt others by it. Then, Stephen, there is another thing about which I want you to be careful. You are impatient and hasty, and do not do things thoroughly."

"I get in a hurry, Mother, and then I can't go on."

"Yes, I know; you begin well, and then have not the patience and perseverance to go on, and so you spoil your work. You must conquer this, Stephen; it is very unconscientious, and it will make you of no use in the world. Things begun and thrown aside are useless. You do not learn your lessons perfectly; you half know them; and unless you thoroughly learn and understand them you will forget them and they will be no use to you. I am most anxious that you should conquer this habit, and learn to do things thoroughly."

"It is so tiresome, Mother, and I want to get on to something else."

"Yes, that is just the thing; you get things out, and don't put them away again. If you put coals on the fire you scatter the bits about on the floor and don't pick them up; if you wash your hands you throw down the wet towel anywhere; if you put on your boots, you leave your shoes kicking about on the floor for anyone to tumble over.

Stephen laughed.

"Do you know why all this is, Stephen? You have not got an ideal before you of how things ought to be done. Everything that is worth doing at all is worth doing well. You should make up your mind that everything you do shall be thoroughly good—perfect in its way."

"Oh, but I can't do things perfectly, Mother, boys can't."

"Not all at once, perhaps; but unless you aim at perfection you will not do anything as well as you can. If you aim low you will achieve low, also. Do you remember one who said 'Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect?'"

"That was Jesus: but, Mother, how could anyone be that? Did Jesus expect anyone to be that?"

"He expected us all to try—to have it before us in all we do—to aim at perfection, and never be satisfied with anything lower, then we should at least grow nearer to it."

"It must have been because he was so good himself that he didn't understand people who couldn't be so good."

"No, I think he understood; but Stephen, what was it that made him so good? It was the height of his aim, and the strength of his resistance to evil; he did not for one moment yield. With us the fault is that we yield so easily, and that we do not keep our eyes steadfastly fixed on the highest possible aim."

"But 'as God is perfect' Mother?"

"Yes, in the same way; think how God makes things just as perfect where they may never be seen—things hidden under the earth or sea—on mountain solitudes; the wonders of the stars and worlds which are only discovered partially and by degrees, if ever—which have been perfect in their order and beauty, though unknown and unseen; they show how God loves perfect work; and in these ways, in our own little works—we must strive 'to be perfect as God is perfect.' It is in the kind of our work that perfection lies, not in its greatness. In your games, Stephen, you do try to play as well as ever you can; if you run a race you do not lag, you put out all your power to try and reach the goal. You have an aim before you, and you try with all your might to reach it. St. Paul says of his own life 'forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ,' likening to a race, in which he who first reaches the goal gains the prize; and that prize is the 'high calling' of God to each of us to 'be perfect.' When I was a child we had an old Bible with pictures in, and one picture was opposite the place where St. Paul says those words. The picture was of five or six Roman youths running a race, and one had just reached the goal—which was a post, with the prize on the top—the prize being a wreath of laurel or bay, which the youth was just seizing. That old picture always comes to my mind when I hear Paul's words. I daresay he had seen some of those races among the Roman or Greek lads, when he was on his journeys. You have your race to run now, my boy; and without strenuousness and perseverance and self-denial we can do no good thing."

Stephen sat very still, looking at the flickering fire. Both were silent a long time. Then he sat upright, and took his mother's hand, and said "Mother, I will press forward to the goal. You shall not be disappointed in me."

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

In a small chamber, friendless and unseen,
Toiled o'er his types one poor, unlearned young man;
The place was dark, unfurnitured, and mean;
Yet there the freedom of a race began.

O Truth! O Freedom! how are ye still born
In the rude stable, in the manger nurst!
What humble hands unbar those gates of morn
Through which the splendours of the New Day burst!

So LOWELL wrote of WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON, the centenary of whose birth, falling to-morrow on a Sunday, December 10, brings a fitting opportunity for the commemoration of his life of single-hearted devotion to a great cause. Others had laboured and suffered before him in the cause of the oppressed slave, but GARRISON was the man of the hour in his own century. He took up the work for which JOHN WOOLMAN had prepared the way in the eighteenth century, influential by the simple faithfulness of his unselfish life, more perhaps than any other man, in cleansing the Society of Friends from participation in that great iniquity. And it was a humble Quaker, BENJAMIN LUNDY, whose example first gave to GARRISON the strong impulse, which he followed to the uttermost, to devote his life to the cause of emancipation.

As co-editor with LUNDY of an anti-slavery paper, he had already been in prison in Baltimore, for the vehemence of his attack on the great evil, when on New Year's Day, 1831, he issued in Boston the first number of the Liberator, with its clear policy of immediate emancipation and the memorable declaration: "I will be harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice. I am in earnest. I will not equivocate; I will not excuse. I will not retreat a single inch, and I will be heard." To SAMUEL J. MAY, the young Unitarian minister, who was his friend and fellow-worker from the first, but who once remonstrated with him for the vehemence of his language, he said: "Brother MAY, I have need to be all on fire, for I have mountains of ice about me to melt." That was in Boston, the stronghold of northern respectability and vested interest; but there was far more than that dead weight of resistance to be overcome, there were the fierce passions of the South, and it was a marvel that the man who would not equivocate or retreat a single inch in that "martyr-age" of the Republic, escaped with his life. He was a man of peace, who held consistently the principle of non-resistance, and he was not afraid to die for the cause. His noble spirit was well expressed in those words of rebuke to a friend who wanted to fight for him a way of safety out of the tumult of the Boston mob of 1835: "Do you wish to become like one of those violent and blood-thirsty men who are seeking my life? Shall we give blow for blow and array sword against sword? God forbid! I will perish sooner than raise my hand against any man, even in self-defence, and let none of my friends resort to violence for my protection. If my life be taken, the cause of emancipation will not suffer. God reigns—His throne is undisturbed by this storm."

That is the true martyr spirit, and while we may feel that with THEODORE PARKER we should have been ready to fight in defence of the helpless slave, we must honour GARRISON for his consistent loyalty and the fearless testimony of his life. He was the advocate not only of freedom for the slave, but of temperance and purity, and of equal rights for women. His voice was heard in this country as in America, and now after the peaceful close of his strenuous life, when the great victory was won, he is held in high honour, and his memory cherished as an inspiration for all unselfish workers for humanity. When he died in 1879, WHITTIER, who had been his friend from earliest manhood, wrote a tribute, of which the first verses may be repeated here:—

The storm and peril overpast,
The hounding hatred shamed and still,
Go, soul of freedom! take at last
The place which thou alone canst fill.

Confirm the lesson taught of old—
Life saved for self is lost, while they
Who lose it in His service hold
The lease of GOD'S eternal day.

Not for thyself, but for the slave
Thy words of thunder shook the world;
No selfish griefs or hatred gave
The strength wherewith thy bolts were hurled.

From lips that Sinai's trumpet blew
We heard a tender under song;
Thy very wrath from pity grew,
From love of man thy hate of wrong.

Now past and present are as one;
The life below is life above;
Thy mortal years have but begun
Thy immortality of love.

DEVELOPMENTS OF PAULINE TEACHING.

II.

CREATION AND REDEMPTION.

THE thought of the Apostle Paul during his active ministry was largely occupied with the work of Christ for humanity at large, independent of the obligations of the Jewish law. This resulted, as we have seen, from the conditions under which he believed himself to have known his Lord and received his call. Gazing into the future, he saw the Son advance out of the hidden heaven clothed with regal glory, to engage in the final struggle with the hostile powers which would end in the ultimate subjection even of death. Of these powers, however, and their destiny, a somewhat different view is presented in the two Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians.

(1) From ancient times, and among many nations, the contrast of light and darkness has supplied a moral and spiritual symbolism easily understood. But there is always a tendency to convert such symbols into facts. Jesus could use the two terms to mark the difference between the "single" and the "evil" eye, as the soul's vision was illumined or obscured (Matt. vi. 22, 23). But there was an outer as well as an inner gloom, and the two blended together as the night and its blackness came to be regarded as the home and the hour of the powers of evil (cp. Luke xxii. 53). The antithesis is not unnoted by Paul; for the Lord, when he comes, will bring to light the hidden things of darkness (1 Cor. iv. 5). So the believer is summoned to give thanks unto the Father (Col. i. 12, 13): "Who made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, who delivered us out of the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love."

The realm of darkness, then, is the sphere of the agents of wickedness. There is the abode of the world-rulers, who once got the Lord of glory into their power, and—ignorant of the true wisdom—brought him to the cross (1 Cor. ii. 8). But with them were associated the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places (Eph. vi. 12)—the mysterious antagonists whom the Son would at length subdue. These lordships, authorities, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers (Eph. i. 21, Col. i. 16, cp. Secrets of Enoch, xx.) are all apparently regarded as the adversaries of the truth; at least, they will only submit to the Christ under compulsion. They are the retinue of the Prince of the Power of the air (Eph. ii. 2), who is the active cause of the disobedience of humanity. Beneath the tiers of heavens, then, invisible themselves in the invisible air, are battalions of spirits constantly at work to frustrate and baffle the saving purpose of God. They will not, indeed, succeed; for already has God triumphed over them in the cross (cp. the very obscure passage in Col. ii. 15). The precise mode and nature of this victory is not, indeed, described, but it points to an extension of the efficacy of the death of Christ which is of high consequence. For if, on the one hand, this great surrender gave God the opportunity to "put off the powers from himself" and disavow them, it also seems to have given them the means of reconciliation with him (Col. i. 20, cp. 16). The problem is nowhere worked out in detail; but it connects itself with that aspect of the world's failure and disappointment which should pass, at the "revealing of the sons of God," into perfect satisfaction and joy. Ancient prophecy had delighted to look forward to the renovation of Nature, when the ideal future should begin. A brighter sun and a more fruitful soil, a reign of peace instead of animal ferocity, a wondrous prolongation of human life—nay, a new heaven and a new earth where death should be no more—these were among its hopes. Interpreting the whole scene of the past by man's share in it, a primitive speculation had found an explanation for the outward sternness of life in its inner aspects of sin and guilt; only remove the cause and the fulness of its riches would be realised. So even the physical creation yearned for a restoration which it could not achieve for itself. It lay in the bondage of corrupti n; it longed to share the liberty of the glory of the children of God (Rom. viii. 20, 21). The great event which had brought salvation to man could not be limited to him. The whole world must feel its force. No other creature, indeed, was ever said to have been made in the image of God; it is in man that God finds the reflection of his being. It is man—not the angel-powers—that is destined to high fellowship with him. The ultimate harmony, however, required that the new manhood created by the life-giving spirit of Christ should have a new world for its home, a world from which all trace of imperfection shall have disappeared, a world in which the divine purpose shall be at last fulfilled. Plastic beneath the sway of its exalted Lord, a spiritual nature must correspond with a spiritual humanity.

(2) But the purpose of God was not new. The heavenly wisdom had its own secrets, and the Father, who had devised them before the worlds (1 Cor. ii. 7), waited the appointed time for them to be disclosed. The vast drama of redemption had, in fact, all been planned from the beginning; there was nothing in it accidental; the mission of the Son could only take place when the age was ripe. Far away, then, in the counsels of the Creator there was reserved the mystery of the Redeemer (Col. i. 26, 27):—"The mystery which hath been hid from all ages and generations, but now it hath been manifested to his saints, to whom God was pleased to make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ in you, the hope of glory."

But just as this great act of the Father's love existed ideally in the divine mind eternally, so also did its consequences. The gifts of the spirit were no more fortuitous than the life and death of Christ. From the side of man, indeed, it might be impossible to predict where they would fall. But in the energy of God there could be no chance. In all his operation there was a steadfast meaning. And this was not devised now for the first time. The mighty plan might be unfolded step by step before man's eyes. But God was not arranging its development as it proceeded, to meet the contingencies of the unforeseen. From the first advent to the second all was predetermined, and every new soul gathered into the Church did but fulfil some part of the immense design. The preacher of the Gospel who declared to the Gentiles "the unsearchable riches of Christ" was thus himself an instrument of the grace of God which was given to him according to the working of his power (Eph. iii. 9, 10): "To make all men see what is the dispensation of the mystery which from all ages hath been hid in God who created all things; to the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in the heavenly places might be made known through the church the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord."

And the believers, in their turn, whose salvation was so certain that it could be said that they were already raised with Christ, and made to sit with him in the heavenly places (Eph. ii. 6), had their share in the everlasting counsels of the Most High (Eph. i. 3–5): "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ; even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blemish before him in love: having foreordained us as sons through Jesus Christ unto himself according to the good pleasure of His will, to the praise of the glory of his grace."

The reconciliation, then, included all things in earth and heaven; and would take the form of a new creation, where the outward scene should match the glory of the inward spirit. And as the new creation in humanity was already the work of Christ, so also would be the renovation of the world. But these events were in themselves only possible through the eternal purpose. The personal medium of their accomplishment, the Son, was part of that purpose, and, hence, in a manner, shared its eternity. He could thus be designated as "first-born of all creation" (Col. i. 15), not in the sense of belonging to it, but of preceding it. From this it needed but one inference to make the scheme complete. The spiritual creation in which the reconciliation process would fulfil itself, was the work of Christ, and had its actual basis in the believer's own experience of the new life. But the spiritual creation was the final achievement of the original divine intent. In that intent the Son had from all ages been designated the chief agent. He was, therefore, the author, not only of the ultimate spiritual creation, but of that which existed now, on which it would be based. His place in the salvation of the world implied also his place in its production. If he was, as the testimony of the church affirmed, the instrument of God in the accomplishment of holiness, he took part in all the steps which Providence appointed for that end. He was the Power, he the Wisdom of God; he was the "Son of his love"; and so redemption and creation, the worlds of spirit and of sense, had but one maker, even as they were designed for one aim (Col. i. 14–17): "In whom we have our redemption, the forgiveness of our sins: who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of all creation; for in him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities, or powers; all things have been created through him and unto him; and he is before all things, and in him all things consist."

The reader who approaches this thought from the study of the life of Jesus in the evangelic records, and from the modern conceptions of the universe as the scene of an ever-present energy, finds it hard to follow the logic of the primitive faith. We cannot easily comprehend the imaginative modes by which what we should call ideas in the mind of God could be viewed as active powers or as living persons. These conceptions belong to an order of beliefs no longer natural to us. Consider, for example, the steps by which we have come to understand the laws of motion according to which the earth and its fellow-planets travel round the sun. We might, in Biblical fashion, represent Newton to ourselves as an embodiment of God's Wisdom, so that as another great astronomer, Kepler, said, he was able to think the thoughts of God. For us, it might be said, the solar system was created mentally in him, because through him we first realised its meaning as a whole, conceived its relations, comprehended its inner constitution. The image which we form of it in our minds was first made by him. We are able to think of it because he had first wrought it out in his thought. But this language would seem strained and unreal. Still more would it seem so, if it should be argued that because the Wisdom in Newton, which revealed the secret of the solar system, was the same as the Wisdom which created it, therefore, Newton was its original maker. But ancient thought moved readily along such lines, not distinguishing persons from principles, or ideas from forces, or separating quantitatively what seemed identical in quality. In redemption, in the preparation of man for fellowship with God, the church saw the goal of human destiny. The world, with its visible contents and its invisible superhuman powers, was made for man, and in his attainment of salvation the world also realised its intrinsic end. In this great process Christ, as known spiritually to the faithful, was the appointed minister of God's purpose. He was the embodiment of the power and wisdom, the righteousness and love of God. Those same attributes were shown forth in the world; then they must have been ready before creation, and the world was made by them. They were not, however, conceived impersonally; they were concentrated in a person then, just as much as they were known through a person in the days of Christian experience. And the persons who displayed the same characteristics must have been the same. Not the historic Jesus, but the pre-existent Son, was the agent or medium of the activity which produced all things and afterwards held them together. Neither Hebrew insight nor Greek philosophy dealt with our modern notions of force. They did not measure amounts of heat or weight by delicate instruments, but they loved to pass behind to the types or ideas which they conceived to have existed b efore the things we see. These conceptio ns they generalised in large elastic undetermined forms, which had a sort of living personal energy. They spoke of Wisdom or Reason (Thought) as though they had real existence over against God, reflecting his radiance, the copy or image of his being. Nothing that was made was made without them. From our point of view these speculations do not overcome the difficulty of passing from the world as imagined or thought, taking up no room, and having no physical dimensions, to the world of objects which we know by sense in space. The early church, however, was not concerned with this difficulty. They started from the assumption that the world was in the divine plan subordinate to man; it existed only to be the scene of his history; whatever energies controlled him also dominated it. The world was the outcome of a spiritual power which was the basis and guide of all its processes. In the history of man that spiritual power had been manifested most clearly in Christ. So the two conceptions rushed together and became one. The Son of God, from whom, by redemption, the second creation took its rise, was likewise by power and wisdom agent of the first.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

THE Rev. Uffe Birkedal, minister of Det fri Kirkesamfund, the Unitarian congregation in Copenhagen, has made a Danish translation of Milton's "Paradise Lost," which is being issued in seven or eight parts by Mr. Theo. Berg (Skindergade 20, Copenhagen K.). The first part, which has reached us, contains the translation of the first and part of the second book, and a brief introduction to the poem, with a diagram of the universe as therein pictured. We are, unfortunately, not in a position to judge of the quality of Mr. Birkedal's translation, but may quote here the opinion of two well-known Danish critics. Mr. P. R. Rosenberg says: "This translation impresses me as being more than usually successful; powerful, picturesque, and sonorous, in the spirit of the original. . . . It will be a great gain to our literature." And Mr. Sigurd Müller's judgment is: "There is a true ring in the language, and passion in the expression. The verse is strong and beautiful. Altogether, I feel justified in saying that Mr. Birkedal's translation is worthy of the original." Another practical testimony to its worth is the fact that a number of men attached to Danish High Schools have promised contributions towards the expense of publication. This first part reached us some little time ago. Possibly the whole work is now published.

WITH the December number, a sermon on "Forgetting those things which are behind" (preached in Hope-street Church, Dec. 29, 1901), the monthly issue of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day comes to an end. On the cover is advertised the forthcoming volume:—"Richard Acland Armstrong: Memoir by his son, George G. Armstrong, and selected sermons. With an Introductory Letter by Philip H. Wicksteed." The volume, which will contain a beautiful photogravure portrait, will be published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall. Price 5s. net.

PIONEERS FOR GOD.*

BY THE REV. J. PAGE HOPPS.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward!"—Exodus xiv. 15.

IT was a time of great trouble with these liberated Hebrew slaves. Panting for freedom and longing for the Promised Land, they seem to have come to the end of all their hopes. The sea is before them and the Egyptian army is behind them, and the frightened host cries to Moses with mingled reproach and terror, and Moses appeals to God. Whereupon this startling message comes from the Unseen: "Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward!" "Go forward" means go into the deep sea, but they risked it, and behold the waters parted to let them through. So the daring story runs. We may well doubt it as history, but as symbol it is superbly true. It is not the appeal to God that matters so much as the willingness to go forward, and trust Him for the way through the desert or the sea.

This is specially true for all the new messengers of God. The old messengers are apt to settle down on their traditions, to be retarded by precedents, to be conservatives as to tasks and methods; but God's pioneers always come with light equipment, restless feet, and liberated hands. Of them and to them may be applied Walt Whitman's breezy challenge to the United States:—

"We cannot tarry here,
We must march, my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger,
We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest on us depend—
Pioneers! O pioneers!

Have the elder races halted;
Do they drop and end their lesson?
We take up the task eternal, and the burden, and the lesson,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

See, my children, resolute children,
By those swarms upon our rear, we must never yield or falter,
Ages back in ghostly millions, growing there behind us, urging.
Pioneers! O pioneers!

O, to die advancing on!
Are there some of us to droop and die? has the hour come?
Then upon the march we fittest die: soon and sure the gap is filled,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

Till, with sound of trumpet,
Far, far off, the day-break calls:—hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind!
Swift to the head of the army! swift!
spring to your places!
Pioneers! O pioneers!"

It is a fine word, this of "Pioneer." It is an old French word, meaning a foot soldier, and specially a foot soldier who digs and lays mines, one who marches and one who explodes! Evidently, one who goes ahead and clears the way. It is a splendid office, and one calculated to call out all that is adventurous, animated, and heroic. The advance guard is the guard of danger but of honour. The more pioneer the more credit. The pioneers are always in the minority, but they make tracks through the desert, and determine the roads along which the main army will ultimately go. And so the poor reformers have always really been of more consequence than the splendid kings.

The pathos of it is that, as a rule, it is the pioneer's fate to be misunderstood, dreaded, resisted, crucified. It is inevitable. The pioneer has to be different from the rest. In the intellectual world, in politics, in religion, he has to contradict, to be singular, to sternly ask the authorities for credentials. More or less, he will be the despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. For once in my life let me speak of myself. I remember well my own pioneering days in Glasgow, when, on the Glasgow School Board, I had to set myself against nearly all my fellow members as the advocate of secular and ethical education only in the Board Schools. After a particularly hard fight one morning, when the business was over and I was sitting alone near the fire, one of my opponents came behind me, put his arms round my neck, and gently said, "Ah, my dear Page Hopps, there is nothing the matter with you but this, that you were born fifty years too soon." And now the great progressive forces are all coming round to what I advocated then. So, in the north of Scotland, I well remember being stoned in the hall and through the streets for preaching what is now practically accepted by the large majority of Scotland's representative preachers. I can see now, in the mind's eye, that fiery zealot who, during one of my religious lectures, got up, shook his fist in my face, and called me "The devil." That man, or the like of him, is now "clothed and in his right mind," and will never do it again. I remember, too, how in a court of law in Scotland, a pirate of a book of mine, defended himself with the plea that, as a heretic, I had no standing in claiming the law's protection, and that I had no civil rights; the advocate on the other side declaring that a few generations ago I should have been on Glasgow green or elsewhere paying for my heresy with my liberty or my life; and he seemed to regret that it could not be so now. But all that is past, never to return; and my heresy of thirty years ago is, even in Scotland, the winning orthodoxy of to-day. Looking back, all along the line of humanity's march, it is clear that nearly all the so-called "heretics" and "rebels" were really pioneers who only went on before to prepare the way. For many years, an ignored or dreaded heresy has found its shelter here, but to-day that heresy has its nest in Westminster Abbey, the City Temple, and many a place of honour.

Jesus was altogether a pioneer. He led the way out of Judaism—a narrow, exclusive and scornful provincialism—into the humanitarian Promised Land. "We have Abraham for our father" was the boast of the Jews, but Jesus broadened the basis with the splendid universalism of the saying, "They shall come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob." Jew and Samaritan quarrelled about the right place of worship, whether Jerusalem or Gerizim, but the great human brother looked beyond both, and said: "The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." And they crucified him; but he was right.

May we not say, then, that God is always on the side of the pioneers? It seldom looks like it, but that is because we look in the wrong direction for the signs of God's presence. We take the world's standard for His standard; and that is altogether wrong. We think of what the world calls "success," of happiness, of the sunny side of the great highway. But the inexorable God calls His chosen ones to make paths in the desert. His is "the voice of one that crieth in the wilderness," "Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make level in the desert a highway for our God"; and that means solitude, and hard work, and hunger, and thorns. The truth is that God is the mysterious Time-Spirit which unceasingly urges His world onward, and the strong, the animated; and the noble spirits best respond to His call.

I am deeply enamoured of that fine record in the Old Testament:—"Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee. So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran." Is not that wonderfully true of the brave little Unitarian army which, for 200 years in England, has heard that call and obeyed? And what do we see and hear to-day? Westminster Abbey beckoning to Little Portland-street to go over, on the plea that there are more Unitarians in the Church than out of it. But our testimony is not yet finished; and the work of the pioneer is not yet at an end. God is still too crudely regarded in the old anthropomorphic way, and is too harshly pictured as an oriental despot, more to be feared than trusted, and rather to be appeased than loved. The Bible is still too much made the tyrant of the free spirit, the stifler of the conscience and the silencer of the reason. The supreme law of progress is too slightly believed in and trusted, especially with regard to life beyond so-called death. The world is not yet sufficiently emancipated from the bribery of heaven and the fear of hell. We have not yet brought the life to come within the sphere of the splendid discovery of the law of evolution. We are still under the delusion that there is a natural and a supernatural, and strongly need the illuminating and unifying thought that the universe is indeed one, and that all is natural, from the activity of God in the secret of the atom to the activity of man in manipulating all that the atom does or is. And all this belongs properly to the testimony of the heretics who have, all along the line, led on to the advanced conclusions of to-day.

It is here that we may find the reason why, though all the churches of Christendom have followed us, we are still few in number. The advance is on our side as well as on theirs, and it is nearly synchronous. The Unitarians of an earlier day—if you go far enough back—were less advanced than the main body of the so-called "orthodox" of to-day. Priestley, for instance, was less advanced than Archdeacon Wilberforce, and I question whether Belsham was really as far on the road as is the minister of the City Temple. The Unitarians of to-day are still the pioneers, instead of being the absorbed, because they have gone marching along, and I do not see why we should mourn over the pioneer's lot, if we choose the pioneer's path.

Now bring all this home to this assembly, for it applies to every one of us. We cannot all be pioneers in the great historic sense; but that does not absolve us from living the pioneering life; and there are homes and workshops and clubs and associations for our arenas of action. And is it not the word of truth and soberness to say that we do not live at all, in the true sense of the word, if we only drift, and say "It is no business of mine. Let the world go its way; I will go mine"?—an ignoble part to play! The more manhood or womanhood the more pioneering; that is the right view of character and life. Be something, testify to something, prove something. Disdain to be a mere echo, a lounger through life, a weakling, a dull acceptor of the opinions or of the fashions appointed for you. Be a pioneer, if only as an example of pioneering and of free and independent thought.

Listen to the simple but animating call of one of our modern seers:—

Speak thy thought if thou believ'st it!
Let it jostle whom it may,
E'en although the foolish scorn it,
Or the obstinate gainsay:
Every seed that grows to morrow
Lies beneath a clod to-day.

If our sires (the noble-hearted
Pioneers of things to come),
Had like thee been weak and timid,
Traitors to themselves, and dumb,
Where would be our present knowledge?
Where the hoped Millennium?

Where would be our free opinion,
Where the right to speak at all,
If our sires, like thee, mistrustful,
Had been deaf to duty's call,
And concealed the thought within them,
Lying down for fear to fall?
Have not ages long departed,
Groaned, and toiled, and bled for thee?
If the past have lent thee wisdom,
Pay it to futurity.

To me it is at once the truest and the most gloriously beautiful solution of the riddle of the universe to believe that God has knit it together in the bonds of law and breathed into it spiritual life, to the end, above all other ends, that it may sustain countless myriads of spiritual beings who shall love one another faithfully and well, and love Him their God with all their heart and mind, and soul and strength.—R. A. Armstrong.

MANSFORD STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

OPENING OF NEW CLUB-ROOMS.

FRIENDS of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, and especially the workers there, are to be warmly congratulated on the new club-rooms, the opening of which was celebrated by a public meeting on Tuesday evening, and again on Thursday. The Church and Mission premises form now a fine block of buildings, occupying a compact site between Mansford-street and Blythe-street, which are parallel streets on the north side out of Bethnal Green-road. The Church and parsonage have their front in Mansford-street, and the new front of the club-rooms is in Blythe-street, where its substantial comfort and the friendly welcome it offers to the people of that crowded district form a great addition to the appearance of the street and an effective witness to the goodwill that resides within. It is no exaggeration to say that the new club-rooms were inspected on Tuesday evening by the large gathering of friends with admiration and delight. The lower rooms, which occupy the basement and first floor, have been thoroughly renovated, while the great addition is the second floor, with its one large room for the working men's club, and the fine new front of the whole building. In addition to the entrance and the staircase window over it, there are four windows on each floor to the front. Mr. Ronald P. Jones is the architect, and, in responding on Tuesday evening to a very cordial vote of thanks for all that he had done, in addition to presenting his professional fees to the building fund, he spoke in very high terms of the way in which Mr. Hunt, the builder, had carried out the work. The total cost has been £1,200, and of this £1,100 is already contributed. Now that the result is seen, there can be little doubt that the remaining £100 required will be gladly given.

The meeting on Tuesday evening was very largely attended. Friends gathered first of all in the large schoolroom under the church, where tea and coffee were served, not only friends from a distance and workers at the Mission, but a goodly company of mothers and other residents in the district. Then, after the club-rooms had been inspected, a public meeting was held in the church, over which Mr. Charles W. Jones, of Liverpool, presided. Among those present were the Rev. Henry Gow, the first minister of the Church and Mission; the Rev. John Ellis, who succeeded the Rev. W. G. Cadman, the second minister; and the Rev. Gordon Cooper, the present minister. Mr. Cadman wrote regretting that he was not able to make the journey from Macclesfield to be present. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill, who was member for S.-W. Bethnal Green, 1885-1900, was also present. Great regret was expressed at the absence of Mr. Stanton W. Preston, to whose enthusiasm and faith in the work it is largely due that such progress has been made.

Mr. J. CLASSON DRUMMOND, at the beginning of the meeting, made a statement. He reported a great many letters of regret for absence, showing that they had the sympathy of a large public, and read Mr. Cadman's letter. He then told of the origin and progress of the men's club, which had rendered the new building necessary. It was in 1902, during Mr. Ellis's first winter, that an effort had been made to reach the men of the district. In the following winter also friendly meetings were arranged, and there were lectures and debates, in which they had the sympathy and help of Mr. Pickersgill. In the autumn of 1904 a working men's club was formed. They began with 20 members, but very soon had 80, and from meeting one night in the week soon found it necessary to have every night. The success of this effort inevitably crowded up the other work of the Mission, and it became evident that they must either enlarge their premises or give up the club, for it was out of the question to abandon the other work, which was for the benefit of the young people. They therefore decided to build, and asked Mr. Ronald Jones, one of their number, to prepare plans. He furnished alternative plans, and with the second, which included the whole new front and the fine upper room for the club, not only offered to superintend the work, but promised his fees as architect as a donation to the building fund. When, further, they received considerable promises on condition that the larger plan was carried out, the committee felt that they had no choice, but must go forward. They were confident that friends would not allow the work to be curtailed for want of money. There was so much life in the Mission, so much was being done for old and young alike, that it would have been a failure of duty to neglect that opportunity. They were trusting now that increased donations and subscriptions in support of their work and more workers would be forthcoming, and so their act of faith would be fully endorsed by their friends.

The Rev. GORDON COOPER, after expressing his gratitude to those who had crowned many acts of kindness by giving them those grand new buildings, described the use to which they would be put. The new upper room was for the Working Men's Club, which would be open every night of the week, and met a great want in that neighbourhood. The rooms below were for the Preston Club, which served the same purpose for their young men. They intended in the clubs not only to provide opportunities for friendship and wholesome recreation but to have lectures and addresses which would waken interest in the deeper questions of life.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES then moved a resolution expressing satisfaction at the completion of the premises, and the hope that the Mission may long be a centre of social and religious influence in the neighbourhood. Their object, he said, was exactly the same as that of the originators of such Domestic Missions, but it was an object which led to natural developments in accordance with the needs of the time. He recalled the memory of Dr. Tuckerman, Channing's friend, who established the first Mission in Boston, which set the example followed in this country; and then he told the story of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, founded after Dr. Tuckerman's visit in 1833, and the sermon preached by the Rev. J. H. Thom on Christmas Day, 1835. They liked to think in Liverpool that theirs was the first Domestic Mission in England,* and they were fortunate in their first minister, the Rev. John Johns, who died a martyr to his devotion to the neglected poor. Mr. Jones gave many interesting particulars of the work in Liverpool and its developments, in the present Mill-street buildings, with their beautiful chapel, and concluded with warm congratulations on the progress of the work at Mansford-street.

The Rev. J. ELLIS, who seconded, said that an institutional church was what that district needed, and he was sure the enlargement of the club rooms would be a great benefit. He paid a tribute to Mr. Classon Drummond and Mr. Punnett, to whom the success of the Men's Club was so largely due. He commended that work to the members of the Laymen's Club, especially in connection with the lectures and addresses which were to be given.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE added his congratulations, and spoke of the great value of such a Mission as that for the development of character, to which, rather than to any relief funds, he said, they must look, as the surest remedy for the evils of poverty.

Mr. PICKERSGILL and Mr. W. WALLACE BRUCE also spoke, and the resolution was unanimously carried.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON then moved, and the Rev. H. Gow seconded, the resolution of thanks to Mr. Ronald Jones, alluded to above, and he replied.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. H. EPPS, and seconded by Mr. E. B. SQUIRE, brought this very encouraging meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. Eustace Thompson writes from 47, Upper Grange-road:—"I hope that some of the kind friends who in former years have sent Christmas donations for the Bermondsey Sunday-school, and that others, too, if they desire an opportunity to be "Friends Indeed," will remember us at this season. Cast-out books, in good or fair condition, would also be acceptable for the school library; to arrive, if possible, before the end of December, to be ready for use at the New Year.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, S.E., writes:—"May I be permitted to appeal as usual in your columns in aid of my Poor's Purse? I am desirous of making the usual Christmas gifts to the poor of my congregation, of giving the annual dinner to one hundred aged destitute persons of the neighbourhood, and of meeting, in some measure, the claims for assistance in emergencies during the coming year. The poverty in the immediate vicinity of our chapel is most distressing. Contributions in money, clothing (children's especially), boots, books, toys, &c., will be gratefully received and acknowledged."

London: George's Row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes: "Will you please allow me to make an appeal to those kind friends who are willing to help the poor at this season of the year? Money is very specially needed for the 'Poor's Purse,' and for Christmas cheer, parties, &c. Seldom has distress been more acute than at this time. I shall be glad also to receive gifts of new or cast-off clothing, boots, books, toys, &c. They should be sent to the Domestic Mission, George's Row, St. Luke's, London, E.C., or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, N."

London: Rhyl-street Mission.—Dr. Read makes the following appeal:—"My Poor's Purse is now nearly exhausted, and, as there is a good deal of distress in the immediate neighbourhood of the Mission, especially in the case of those families where the breadwinner is unemployed through no fault of his own, I shall be much obliged if the friends who kindly send their donations for the Poor's Purse and the various beneficent activities of the Mission will do so as soon as possible. I shall also be glad to receive any gifts of new or cast-off clothing, or any kind of warm bed covering that friends may have to bestow, as these are often of more value to the poor than actual monetary help. Parcels should be sent to the Mission, 4, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W., and letters to my private address: 22, Willoughby-road, Hampstead, N.W.

London: Stamford-street.—The Rev. W. L. Tucker writes from the Blackfriars Mission, Stamford-street, S.E.:—"Allow me to make the usual Christmas appeal for donations to our Poor's Purse. This fund is quite distinct from the other accounts of the mission, and depends entirely on the results of the annual Christmas appeal. In a large and overcrowded district like ours there is always a lot of distress which is accentuated by winter and lack of employment. Any gifts of money or clothing will be gratefully acknowledged and carefully administered."

Manchester Domestic Mission.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop, of the Willert-street Mission, Collyhurst, writes:—"Although there is not such dire poverty as at this time last year, yet we are being made conscious that the poor are ever with us, and I appeal again to our friends to help to give cheer to the struggling widows and the poor children. We are in need of cast-off clothing for disposal, as very little has been sent to the mission during the past year. And to enable us to give our large school a good time this Christmas we require books, dolls, and toys, and a considerable sum of money. Donations would be thankfully received."

Accrington.—On Wednesday, November 29, the last of a course of lectures on "Modern Astronomy" was delivered in the Unitarian schoolroom by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal. The average attendance was about 200.

Bristol.—On Friday, November 24, at the conference of teachers and friends of the Lewin's Mead and Mission Sunday-schools, a paper was read by Miss Curnock on the Geneva Congress. Limelight illustrations added to the interest of the address. Mr. J. Kenrick Champion presided.

Bury District Sunday school Union.—The first meeting of the winter season was held last Saturday at Bank-street Schools, Bury. After tea, the president, Mr. Wm. Yates, took the chair, and the Rev. S. Thompson, of Rivington, gave a most excellent paper on "The Function of the Sunday-school." There was a sparse attendance, but the proceedings throughout were of a most hearty character.

Clifton.—The Rev. E. I. Fripp entered last Sunday on his ministry at Oakfield-road, and in the morning service spoke of the mutual relations of minister and congregation and the true ideal of a free church.

Dewsbury.—On November 25 and 28 a very successful sale of work was held. The object of the sale being to raise funds for building a new kitchen, and turning the old kitchen and another smaller room into one good room suitable for various week-night meetings. With the amount realised by the sale, together with £50 promised by the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, the church is now in a position to proceed with this important project. On the first day the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, of Wakefield, opened the sale, supported by the District ministers; and the ceremony on the second day was performed by Mrs. Currer Briggs, ex-Lady Mayoress of Leeds, who was supported by the Mayor of Dewsbury—Major Chaley Fox. Hearty thanks are tended by the Dewsbury friends to all who assisted them.

Dukinfield (Farewell and Presentation).—On Sunday, November 26, as we reported last week, the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, concluded his twenty years' ministry at the Old Chapel. The only other ministry of similar length during the past century was that of Robert Brook Aspland. For his morning sermon Mr. Tayler chose the same text as on his first Sunday there, twenty years and nine months ago, Psalm lxi. 2: "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I"; and for the evening sermon, when the chapel was crowded with a congregation of some 600, 2 Cor. xiii. 13, "Finally, brethren, farewell; be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you." He was thankful to have been permitted to work among them for so long, and to have found hearts responsive to his message. He could never feel a stranger there. He appealed to them faithfully to carry on the work, and quoted Whittier's lines:—

* As a matter of fact, London and Manchester were first in the field.—ED.

"Others shall sing the song,
Others shall right the wrong;
Finish what I begin,
And all I fail to win.
What matter, I or they?
Mine or another's day,
So the right word be said,
And life the sweeter made."

At afternoon school a presentation was made to Mr. Tayler of a handsome silver rose bowl from the teachers, children of the Sunday-school, and other friends. Mr. Tom Brown, one of the directors, was in the chair, and spoke with much feeling of Mr. Tayler's long connection with the school. The presentation was made by Miss Harrop. Mr. Tayler gratefully acknowledged the gift. The Dukinfield Sick Nursing Association, which Mr. Tayler was largely instrumental in founding, has passed a resolution of regret at Mr. and Mrs. Tayler's departure, and appreciation of their work for that Association and their generous support of that and every other philanthropic and social movement in the town.

Horwich.—The proceeds of the Bazaar held on November 29, 30, and December 2, on behalf of the Independence and Guarantee Funds, including many kind contributions from friends far and near, amounted to £303 The following gentlemen opened on the respective days:—Mr. F. Monk, J.P., of Warrington (in place of Mr. C. Sydney Jones, of Liverpool, who was prevented by illness from fulfilling his engagement); Mr. J. Percy Taylor, J.P., of Bolton; and Mr. William Healey, J.P., of Heywood. The following gentlemen presided:—Mr. Oliver Winder, of Overdale, Horwich; Mr Andrews Crompton, of Rivington Hall; and Mr. J. J. Bradshaw, of Bolton (in place of Mr. Thomas Harwood, of Bolton, who was kept at home by sickness). Wretched weather prevailed on the second day, but from first to last everything passed off well, and the result is highly satisfactory and encouraging.

Kendal.—At the quarterly meeting of members of the Market-place Chapel, on December 3, the minister, on behalf of the committee and friends, made a presentation of a purse containing thirty guineas and an illuminated address to Mr. W. E. E. Robinson, who has acted as organist at Kendal for thirty years.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—The annual sale of work was held on November 23, 24, and 25, when the sum of £87 net was realised. The sale was opened on the first and second days by Sir William Wedderburn, Bart., and Mrs. Bancroft Ellis respectively. The proceeds are being devoted to the current expenses of the church.

Liverpool Sunday-school Society—At a meeting held last Saturday, at the Mill-street Mission, Mrs H D. Roberts read a paper on "Attention." From the teacher's point of view, she said there were two aspects of attention, voluntary and involuntary attention. The latter is the first in order of time, and is that which is natural to a child. He gives a momentary attention to anything which happens to strike his fancy, and one impression quickly effaces another. This is the first difficulty the teacher has to cope with, and to offer some impression which will compete in interest with other impressions, and so compel involuntary attention. But the teacher's chief aim must be to create a habit of voluntary attention by fixing the child's mind intentionally on some object; for if we do not gain attention, we can do very little good. A teacher must be quick to see and hear what is going on around him; if he is unobservant, he cannot expect concentrated attention on the part of the child. Good discipline is the art of securing attention, and every time we succeed in gaining sustained attention from our children, we are insensibly cultivating the habit. Above all things a teacher must have sympathy, there must be an affectionate working together of teacher and taught; a child who cannot be touched by anything else can be reached by sympathy and love. A cordial vote of thanks to Mrs. Roberts, moved by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, the president, and seconded by Rev. J. L. Haigh, brought the meeting to a close.

London: Bermondsey. — On Saturday evening, Dec. 2, a well-attended social meeting was held, at which, on behalf of the congregation, Mr. Geo. Callow gave a hearty welcome to Mr. J. Harrison and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. Mr. Harrison, in response, said it was a great pleasure to him to be able to be present and to testify to the interest of the London Provincial Assembly in the work at Bermondsey. He had great hope of its continuing increase under the fostering care of the Rev. Eustace Thompson. Mr. Edwards also responded. Mrs. Geo. Callow, Mrs. Garrett, and Mr. J. Harrison were thanked for their music, which added so much to the pleasure of the evening.

London: Kilburn (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting of the members and friends of the Unitarian Church was held at Quex-road on Monday evening to welcome the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., and Mrs. Roper. On Sunday Mr. Roper entered on his ministry, and at both services appealed to the congregation for earnest co-operation in the work of the church. The welcome meeting was largely attended, and was a very pleasant and encouraging gathering. Hampstead and Kensington were both well represented by their ministers and members of the congregations, and among other London ministers present were the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, T. E. M. Edwards, F. Allen, E. Daplyn, and V. D. Davis. After a sociable hour and some music, the chair was taken soon after 9 o'clock (late for visitors who had more than an hour's journey to get home afterwards) by Mr. S. T. Johnson, treasurer of the church, who announced telegrams of congratulation and good wishes from the Moss Side congregation, from Mr. and Mrs. Hewitt, who had been members there during the whole of Mr. Roper's ministry, and (later in the evening) from Mr. B. C. Ghosh, who on recent Sundays had been lecturing at Quex-road on Indian Religious Thought. The chairman in his opening address spoke of that capital meeting as showing the warmth of the interest in Mr. Roper's settlement in London. As to the work of their church, Mr. Stronge had laid the foundations on which they were to build. They were still faced by serious difficulties, but difficulties were made to be overcome. He called upon three of their members, Messrs. E. H. L. Barnes, Fleetwood Pritchard, and Leslie Chatfeild Clarke, to offer the welcome of the congregation to Mr. and Mrs. Roper. Mr. Barnes spoke eloquently of the bewildering conditions of life in the great City, and of the place a church should hold in that life, as a centre of quietness for the nurture of the deeper things of the spirit. Mr. Pritchard referred with gratitude to what Mr. and Mrs. Stronge had done for their church. They had not only to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Roper, but to give them every support in carrying on the good work. Mr. Clarke said there were great possibilities in that church, and assured Mr. Roper that he would find there hearts as true even as in the north. The Rev. Henry Gow, in offering a welcome on behalf of London ministers, spoke of Dr. Brooke Herford, to whom that church owed so much. It would have rejoiced him to be there that night, to see what life and strength and promise there was in the church. Mr. Roper had done a fine piece of work at Moss Side, where there was a strong growing church, and they felt sure that he would do a like work in London. It was a great opportunity they had there, and as minister of a neighbouring congregation, which took the deepest interest in their welfare, he was delighted to join in that welcome, and to assure Mr. Roper of the strong sympathy and goodwill of his brother ministers. Dr. C. Herbert Smith spoke on behalf of the London District Unitarian Society, which was proud of Quex-road as a congregation that had so speedily attained to independence. He also got in a word for his Boston Conference scheme, and asked the congregation to form a committee to work for it, as had been done at Mill Hill, Leeds. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie offered the welcome of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, saying with how much hope they looked to Mr. Roper's coming, not only for the sake of that congregation, but for their whole work in London. He spoke of Dr. Herford's earnest interest in that church from its foundation, which was due to his zeal. The conditions he had laid down in consultation with the two Associations, in accepting financial responsibility, had been loyally met by the congregation, which was an example to all in that respect; and he was confident that, in spite of all obstacles, they would soon secure a church building. Mr. Wallace Bruce, as President of the Provincial Assembly, and Mr. Singleton, on behalf of the Unity Club, representing the congregation on its social side, also joined in the welcome, after which a member of the Plumstead congregation formerly at Moss Side offered a spontaneous word of congratulation and tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Roper. In responding to the welcome, the Rev. Charles Roper spoke of the reasons which had led him to come to London. He had always had a deep admiration for Dr. Brooke Herford, and had been inspired by his work. By him he had been confirmed in the belief that a man might stay too long with one church. When, therefore, after seventeen years' work at Moss Side, and the accomplishment of his purpose in the building of church and school, he thought a change might be good he felt that Quex-road, which owed so much to Dr. Herford's influence, was the place to come to. Another reason was that it was a young church untrammelled by a long past. He and Mr. Stronge had been at college together, and he knew what good work Mr. Stronge had done there; but each man must work on his own lines, and he was glad that they had no stereotyped traditions. Their aim must be to erect a church and fill it with devout and earnest worshippers. They must go deep down for their foundations, and build not for their own day only, but for generations to come. Another attraction for him was that they had in that congregation men devoted to public work. He himself must be devoted to church work. His duty was to advocate sound principles, and to lead men to go out from the church to work with zeal for the public good. He had been invited to that Unitarian Church as a Unitarian by Unitarians. He had built up a church in the north on Unitarian lines, and he knew of no instance of anyone being deterred by that fact from joining them. They had 250 enrolled subscribing members, and 60 per cent. of the heads of families were converts. With the controversy as to the Unitarian name he wished to have nothing to do. Their work must appeal mainly to the unattached, and especially to young men, who were often more thoughtful than their elders, and to whom they could be specially helpful. Their protest would be against all kinds of intolerance of thought and action. Theology was essential, and yet his main emphasis would be on the ethical side of religion. He pleaded for regular and punctual attendance at the services, and for the true spirit of brotherhood in the church, in which there was no distinction of class, or of rich and poor. A vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Dr. Hall and seconded by Mr. Roper, brought the proceedings to a close.

London: Stepney.—At the conference last Sunday Mr. C. E. Maurice introduced the subject of conscription, and an animated discussion followed. In the evening Mr. Maurice, who is the son of the late Rev. F. Denison Maurice, preached upon "Peace." Both meetings were well attended. On Monday evening, through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Morton, the parents and elder scholars were invited to tea, after which a conjuring and ventriloquial entertainment was very much enjoyed. At the close Mr. and Mrs. Morton, who were present, were heartily thanked for the pleasure they had given.

Mottram.—The anniversary party and services were held at the close of November. At the party a large number partook of tea, and at the meeting afterwards the chapel was full, and a very good programme was gone through, including addresses from Mr. Wm. Noble, of Bolton (chairman), Rev. H. Bodell Smith, and Mr. Daniel Gee. The anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, who preached excellent sermons, but owing to very wet weather attendances and collections were less than usual for the occasion.

Newport, Mon.—The Rev. George Critchley concluded an eight days' visit to Newport last Sunday. On November 26 he preached to a good congregation, and after lecturing at neighbouring towns on Tuesday and Wednesday, he returned to Newport on Thursday to lecture on "The Miracles of the New Testament." An audience of over 270 persons gathered in the Town Hall Assembly Room under the presidency of Mr. G. H. Llewellyn. In the course of an eloquent and scholarly address Mr. Critchley traced the belief in miracles back to the mythologies of pagan peoples, among whom Christianity gained a foothold in the early centuries. Another contributing cause was the desire of some evangelists to work into the life of Jesus a fulfilment of Hebrew prophecies, and so secure his acceptance by the Jews. Belief in the miraculous was not of the essence of Christianity as taught by its founder; on the contrary, such belief tended to obscure the transcendant beauty of the life and teaching of Jesus. The lecture was followed throughout with the closest attention, and at its conclusion Mr. Critchley was accorded a very hearty vote of thanks. The crowded attendance to hear Mr. Critchley preach last Sunday evening was a striking testimony to the impression made by his visit.

Scarborough.—Mr. G. M. Smith, until recently treasurer of the church, having had to remove from Scarborough in pursuance of his Government duties, has been succeeded in the office of treasurer by Mr. W. Whiteley, 50, Ashville-avenue. The departure of Mr. and Mrs. Smith and family has been greatly regretted by all to whom they were known, and is a great loss to the church and kindred institutions.

Rotherham.—On Thursday evening, Nov. 23, the Rev. J. E. Manning lectured on Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" to the Church of our Father literary and social union. There was a good attendance, and the lecture was much appreciated.

York (Welcome Meeting).—The Rev. R. H. Greaves, formerly of Highgate, has been welcomed as minister of the St. Saviourgate Chapel. The meeting was held in the Kenrick Rooms, adjoining the chapel. There was an excellent attendance of members and friends, and after tea the chairman (Mr. E. F. Lewin) welcomed the Rev. R. H. Greaves on behalf of the congregation. The Rev. Charles Hargrove extended a hearty welcome on behalf of the Yorkshire churches, and, in an interesting address, alluded to the close relationship that had existed between Mill Hill Chapel at Leeds and St. Saviourgate for the last 200 years. The Rev. R. H. Greaves briefly responded, and hoped that the congregation would assist him in the work he had undertaken. Letters of regret for absence were received from the Revs. C. J. Street, Ottwell Binns, W. Reynolds, and John Ellis. A musical programme followed, and after the usual votes of thanks the evening concluded with a dance.

OF nothing may we be more sure than this: that if we cannot sanctify our present lot, we could sanctify no other.—James Martineau.

THE gracious and tender beauty, the exalted holiness of Christ's character touched the hearts that were prepared for its influence, and told them of a love which was its source and its animating centre, and awoke within them the consciousness of a Divine spirit cleansing their earthly and selfish life, and drawing them into a blessed fellowship with all who were like-minded. This experience created new spiritual perceptions, and called for a new interpretation of man and of his relation to God. Thus the grace of Christ which had moved visibly upon the earth, and come into vital contact with human souls, and been wrought by the power of a devoted life and death into human history, was the motive power which carried the mind beyond the confines of the world, and set it amid the eternal scene, where it searched out the deep things of God, and read his purposes of love, embracing all times and lands within his vast redeeming plan.—James Drummond.

ADVERTISEMENTS 806

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE appeals from our Ministers to the Poor, which have appeared in the last two numbers of THE INQUIRER, have not passed unheeded, but we would beg those of our readers who have not yet sent some contribution to look again at the appeals, and to consider the conditions under which these men are giving their lives to that service, and whether at this season it will not be well to cheer their hearts and the hearts of their people by some such token of goodwill.

PROFESSOR BENOYENDRA NATH SEN, of the Presidency College, Calcutta, who, as we announced last week, has returned to this country after his visit to America, is to preach at Highgate to-morrow (Sunday), and on Monday evening the President and Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are giving a reception to him at Essex Hall. Tea and coffee at 8. Address by Professor Sen at 8.45.

THE announcement of the formation of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's Cabinet has been received with the utmost satisfaction, and the comments of political opponents have been, for the most part, very favourable. The presence of Mr. John Morley at the India Office, with Mr. J. E. Ellis as Under-Secretary, is full of promise of what is best for our great dependency, and we shall look with the keenest interest for what Mr. John Burns is able to accomplish as President of the Local Government Board.

LIVERPOOL and Sir Edward Russell are to be congratulated on the issue of the trial, in which he as Editor of the Liverpool Daily Post was charged with criminal libel for the comment of his paper on certain acts of the Licensing Committee. Leading citizens of both political parties bore their tribute to the services rendered by Sir Edward Russell to the cause of social reform, and his acquittal was the signal for a demonstration of great enthusiasm.

A SECOND and third article of Dr. John Watson's confessions of "What Might Have Been," appeared in the British Weekly of November 16 and 23, on Pastoral Work and Preaching respectively. The chief end of preaching, Dr. Watson says, ought to be comfort, and he gratefully records the judgment of a distinguished scholar on his own ministry. "Your best work in the pulpit has been to put heart into men for the coming week." The following passage as to style, we venture to reproduce :—

"Had I another thirty years, I should give more earnest heed to style, and especially I would enrich my mind by daily study of its great masters, so that as a farmer quickens his soil by nitrates, one might enrich his mind by the assimilation of noble language. Our hearers are only puzzled and enraged by unintelligible technical terms and fastidious preciosity, but they are most grateful both for felicity in expression and for grandeur in the note. Their ears may be tickled by smartness but their judgment condemns it in the preaching of the Gospel. Their pulses are stirred by a royal word such as Milton loved to use. It may not be the dress for their own thoughts; they feel, although they may not say it, that this is the becoming dress for the message of God. They are themselves ennobled by hearing such language, and they respect the preacher because he has honoured the Gospel. Splendid words occurring from time to time in our discourses are like embroidery of gold upon the hodden grey. They fill the people's imagination, and cling to their memory; in their golden pomp they are the fitting heralds of Christ. Nothing has degraded preaching more than tawdry appeals, in which the pathos has no passion, and the argument no force. Evangelistic preaching has seemed to me to be, as a rule, careless to a scandal and almost squalid in style, with vain repetitions of hackneyed words by way of exhortation and with incredible anecdotes by way of illustration. But I am moved at present to judge this difficult and delicate form of preaching with the utmost charity, when I review the glaring deficiency of my own style and the repeated evidence of unfinished work. Let me record my solemn conviction that in the day when he gives in his account the preacher of the Evangel will be held responsible, not only for the truth which he declares, but for the dress with which he clothed it."

A MEMORIAL to George Frederic Watts, which has been erected in St. Botolph's Churchyard, Aldersgate, was unveiled by Sir William Richmond on Wednesday. The tablet, which has a full-length figure of the artist, is in terra-cotta, the work of the Compton Arts and Crafts Guild. Over the figure is the artist's motto: "The utmost for the highest." Following his name, below, it is recorded that it was he who placed the other memorials of heroic self-sacrifice in that place. A service was first held in the church, when the Bishop of London spoke of Watts as one of the greatest preachers who ever lived, with the humility of the truly great. At the unveiling, Sir W. Richmond said that his work was deathless, because "every line expressed the beating of a great human heart, speaking in form and colour. It was no idolatry on their part to look upon such a man as a God-given instrument, and as an exponent of all that was of the noblest and best.

THE dramatic performance at St. George's Hall on Wednesday evening, in aid of the funds of the Blackfriars Mission, was a great success. In spite of the fog there was a capital audience, and Mr. Herbert Lawford and his friends are to be congratulated on their performance of "A Snug Little Kingdom," which was greatly enjoyed.

THIS week's Christian World has an illnstrated supplement on the Social Work of the Salvation Army.

CHRISTMAS purchasers of books for young people should by all means send for the classified list published by the Sunday School Association, at Essex Hall, and residents in and about London are strongly urged to pay a visit to the Association's Book-Room, where a number of new books by various publishers are on view.

SOCIAL QUESTIONS IN MANCHESTER.

THE problem of Social Questions and our Churches was taken up at a service and conference held in the Moss Side Unitarian Free Church on Saturday last. The service was conducted by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed delivered the sermon. Taking his text from Matt. xxv. 25 and following verses, he inquired into the reasons for the close relations between social work and the primary cause of the cohesion and work of our churches, viz., love of God. These he found in the fact that love of man is inseparable from the love of God; it is part of the glory of life. But beyond that there was a love which is not a fulfilment but a sacrifice; a sense of the need of doing something; a redeeming love which seeks to save. Love of God is the finding of our own direct personal life. Apart from love of God we can have pity and compassion, but hardly hope, a gospel, glad tidings of great joy for man. But if we have found life in our love of God then we have more than pity, we have the desire to open the gates of life; to evoke capacity and to create power. The two commandments, love of God and love of man, stand together. The second loses its inspiration without the first and without the second the first is baulked of its essential utterance. No man can love God without loving his neighbour. Turning more directly to present-day problems, Mr. Wicksteed asked what is needed and who can help? Life is needed. This was his first answer; and it led to the inquiry, "Who can show us any good?"—who can show us, in life or labour, things which have social significance? If the churches were helping to life in its true sense, if they were showing to any soul any real good in life, then they were complying with the fundamental desire of all social workers—revealing a life worth living—proclaiming a Gospel, and they were socially significant. Then love is needed; the desire that whatever good there is shall be open to all because it is good for all. And knowledge is needed, deeper, wider than many of us can hope to attain. How are we to relieve the pressure of misery—how are we to open the gates of life—the gates of holy desire and lead the way to the social millennium? We need life, love, light. Here there was room for the most varied forms of service. Rich men, having that which most desire, can make their lives socially significant, if, having the means to choose, they chose the life which would appeal to all rational men. Such men proclaim, as Wordsworth by his choice did, that the world in the average desire of man is under a delusion as to what is really good and desirable. There was need for the purification of personal and social ideals, which would be found in practice to mean the socialising of our ideals, and also there was need of the purification of business relations. The question of our business responsibility was not an easy one, but when we find that the desires of others which we promote as a means to promoting our own desire (that is, the gain of money), are base, then there is between our business life and our aspiration and prayer not only a chasm but opposition. If we love God we cannot build our affairs on the evil lusts of men. There was room for men who tried to purify business life, and there was room for men who could do little but who honestly strove to think about these problems. But thinking has its besetting danger, the danger of intellectual fascination which does not issue in action, and there is room for the men who insist on something being done, who in sheer passion may do many foolish things but who force Society to act. Also, there was room for the men of prepared heart and mind—the men who would welcome changes which might rob them of things they loved provided they made them more accessible to those in deeper need. In these problems the churches might help. They could not exclude this consideration. They could only determine whether they themselves would count or not in the great movements of our time.

At the close of the service tea was served in the school-room, and this was followed by a conference, over which the Rev. Dendy Agate presided. The subject for consideration was brought forward in a paper read by Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON. The object before them was, he said, to permeate the life of the churches with the desire of social reform, and the movement of social reform with the spirit of the churches—to make Christians better social reformers and social reformers better Christians. He described a scheme for transplanting from every one of our large cities into selected areas owned by the community those who were at present unemployed, but who seemed likely after some practice to become serviceable in the cultivation of the land. But if public opinion could not be roused sufficiently to undertake a national scheme, a local one was within their grasp. Recent defective legislation had provided a skeleton Distress Committee, and the Christian Churches could hardly find a more inspiring task for their energies than to furnish the Manchester and Salford Distress Committees not only with funds to carry out some part of their work, but also with ideas as to how to set about it. He suggested that the churches connected with the Association should hold simultaneous collections, and should then appoint a committee with power to call in expert agricultural advice, and draw up and present a plan of operation to the local Distress Committee. The churches might also encourage the proper planning out of the areas on the borders of our great cities, so as to ensure more attention to air space and light around the dwellings of the future, and might advocate the provision of suitable houses for the poorer classes at rents within their reach. There was very little hope of the solution of social difficulties unless public opinion was roused sufficiently to insist upon it. Such an opinion could not only be roused but guided on the safest lines by the spirit which sh uld animate the churches—the spirit of sympathy and care for all creatures that needed help and assistance.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, who was asked to open the discussion from the point of view of the churches, showed that in various ways they were all working such ameliorative agencies as were available while at the same time opening their pulpits to the discussion of underlying principles. Miss GITTINS, of Leicester, who attended by special request, called attention to various expressions of opinion which had reached her in connection with the manifesto recently published in THE INQUIRER. She maintained that it was the business of the churches to take up social questions and questions of international goodwill, in all of which the Society of Friends were nobly leading the way and finding as a consequence new and deeper life when some had feared the advent of death. In the narrow interpretation of the truth that churches were worshipping societies she found the explanation of the alienation of men from them. Politics for men, religion for women, was the bad rule of the day, involving the equally bad antithesis of faith and works, emotion and reason. The true Church covered the whole of life, embraced all its interests and enfolded all its children. The discussion was continued by Miss P. Black, A. Dugdale, W. Simpson, H. V. Herford, and others, and a resolution in favour of the establishment of farm colonies for the unemployed was passed and ordered to be sent to the authorities. Votes of thanks were passed, and an excellent and well-attended meeting was brought to a close by hymn and prayer.

THE CITY BOY.*

WHILST most of us are solving social problems in our heads, the wiser few are solving them here and there with their hands. Society is full of accidental knots, which need nothing more than a little patient unravelling to set them free. Boy-life in large towns is one of these. The boy in the street has come to be, of late, too much a boy apart. School and Sunday-school know him no more. He is not often at home—if indeed he has a home—and does not find his habitation in a common lodging-house. He is hard to catch, for he has but lately escaped from control, and is as shy as a young colt. He is in no humour to be tamed. He has no friends out of his own set, and seeks none. If he is to be handled at all, you must take him as he is, and neither be shocked nor bored by him, and at once get rid of the notion that you have a mission to him. Mr. Russell knows boys, because, by a happily arrested development, he is himself a "juvenile-adult." He sees things from their points of view, and feels things as they feel them. He can do, what not one man in a thousand can do, make companions of them. He has boys on his brain, and in his heart, hanging on his arms in the street, sharing his holidays at the sea-side and his table at home. It is this camaraderie that gives his book particular value. It is not the fanciful invention of the novelist, nor the dreamy speculation of the theorist, but a study at very close quarters of the actual boy—"nipper," or "loafer," or "ike," or whatever he may be—and here set down is the plain unvarnished story of his friendships, his quarrels, his occupations, his amusements, his earning and spending, his food, his dress, his reading, his hardships, his temptations, his rudimentary virtues, and his less rudimentary vices. In short, here is that first-hand experience, which is never more useful than when it makes the benevolent feel how little they really know of those to whom they would give a helping hand.

*"Manchester Boys. Sketches of Manchester Lads at Work and Play." By Charles E. B. Russell, Hon. Sec. of the Heyrod Street Lads' Club, Manchester. With Introductory Note by E. T. Campagnac. (Manchester: Sherratt and Hughes. 1905. Price 2s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Russell is a shrewd observer, and can express himself shrewdly, as the following passages will show :—

"The working-class boy rejoices at signs of incapacity in teacher or foreman, and never pities."

"Educationists, who decry corporal punishment, should remember that it has the strong moral approbation of the boys, who in such a case may be held to be entitled to an opinion."

"We must admit there is an excuse for the employer who forgets that his young servant has brains, for the schools have done much to deaden them."

"There is no public cure for public ills."

"Your average boy is not very much concerned about being considered 'good,' and probably to tell a young boy that smoking is 'wicked,' is one of the greatest incentives to him to acquire the habit."

"He is an honest creature who cannot pretend not to be bored when he is bored, and declines to use words which have no sense for him, whatever significance they may have for other people."

This last remark is made in connection with the religion of boys. A boy's religion is described as mainly a reverence for goodness, whenever and wherever it happens to reveal itself to him, and especially that goodness dimly connected in his mind with the figure of one who "went about doing good." This may not mean very much to those who ask for religious "experiences," but we may take it that a boy, if he is allowed to be a boy, will always feel more and believe more than he will ever care to confess to his elders.

The writer does not spare what he believes to be defective in those methods by which our working boys are taught when they are young, housed when they are homeless, and punished when they offend. He has much to say in praise of Training Ships and Industrial Homes, of Lads' Clubs and Holiday Camps, and, in the way of further improvement, he proposes schemes for the establishment of Lodging Houses and Labour Bureaus. Enough has been said to send the reader to the book itself, which, we may add, is an expansion of articles contributed to the Manchester Guardian, and is made more complete by a thoughtful introduction from the pen of a late warden of the Ancoats University Settlement, now one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools. If anything needs correction it is perhaps the author's modesty, for it is doubtful whether the "friend," whose good deeds he often reports, has any existence outside his own pages. This is a point on which his boys might throw some light.

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

THE INCORPORATED LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE SOCIETY FOR THE PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

SIR,—May I once more appeal through your columns for help for our defective children? We have now 62 children under our care, five of whom are big lads living and working at the farm. These boys still come back to the house for their meals and for their baths, and also for their Sunday-school and manual instruction. The farm is only a few minutes' walk from the day-school. We have rented it from the kind donor of our land, and it is a source of great pleasure to all the children. The report of the Government Inspector is most satisfactory. Writing to me lately he said that he wished that Sandlebridge could be multiplied twenty times; he is quite at a loss to know what to recommend to the various authorities whose children are leaving the special day-schools. Over fifty Education Committees and Boards of Guardians have now applied to us. Of course, it is impossible for us to deal with more than a very few of their children, Our experiment is, so far, succeeding beyond expectation. That is, everything is turning out as we planned, and none of the difficulties which we foresaw, and which were predicted for us, have proved insuperable. Our boys, many of whom have been with us now over four years, are as good and happy as when they came to us; in fact, much more so and very much more manageable. Our girls are quite as satisfactory and, in some respects, show more improvement. With two exceptions they are not so old as the boys, but, so far, we see no reason to suppose that we shall have any more trouble with them than with our young men. Of course, we are always anticipating troubles; perhaps that is why we are able to steer clear of them. Meanwhile, it is a great satisfaction to know that these boys and girls, many of whom would certainly have come to grief before now had they been at large, are living a happy, contented, sheltered life. They are not only no danger to other people, but they are able to have a life really worth living themselves. They can never really become self-supporting—they are feeble in body as well as in mind; all of them are undersized and delicate; but they are not unemployed, nor paupers, nor criminals; nor, which would be worst of all, are they fathers and mothers of families. But, after the age of sixteen, we cannot draw grants for these boys and girls from any source. It is true that our farm pays its way now, but we cannot make enough money out of 20 acres of land to keep our farm boys.

By-the-bye, I hope no one will be misled by our statement of accounts. It is true that, on the day of our annual meeting, we had a balance in hand, a balance of £10. And it is true that our affairs are in a healthy condition. But the balance of £400 which is shown by the accountants consists of stock in hand; and our cows and pigs and so forth are not available for cash. As a matter of fact, we have an adverse balance at the bank to-day of about £100. This will be wiped out at the end of the quarter. But every year, as we have more boys and girls over school age, we shall be more and more dependent on the subscriptions of our friends. Still, our subscription list does increase, though slowly, and I am not so anxious about current expenses as about the money for the completion of our new school buildings. Before they are finished we have to find, somehow or another, £2,000 more than we have. They are pretty and suitable buildings, but we are observing the strictest economy in their erection. We were obliged to have them; the demands on our space are unending; we could fill ten such schools as ours.

It is one of the saddest parts of my work that I have so constantly to tell people that there is no room. And then there is another part of our scheme which must be constantly borne in mind. Our farm provides for our growing-up boys; but we have as yet no separate home for our big girls. We shall need this, by-and-by. A little while ago a young lady wrote to me, and said that she would like to help us by endowing one bed in our girls' house. So she sent us £500 and a pretty brass plate; the latter, to the great delight of the child selected, has been affixed over her bed. It would be delightful if someone reading this would do the same for a boy, or for another girl. A great many people who could not give us a large sum of money could give us small sums, either for the new buildings or as an annual subscription towards the maintenance of our scholars who are beyond the school age. I am sure they would give if they could see our children, and could realise the misery from which we are saving them.

Thousands of pounds are spent every year in trying to remedy the evils we are trying to prevent. One good woman who sent me money, wrote: "I send you this because if your work is done, mine will cease." She is a rescue worker. She had seen for herself how many of the girls who come to grief are weak of intellect.

At present, as everyone knows, the law gives us no help for the feeble-minded after the age of sixteen. It is a very foolish sort of a law which assumes that a boy who is feeble-minded at sixteen, will be sane at seventeen. We are trying hard to get it altered. Meanwhile we cannot wait for legislation. Some, at any rate, of the helpless children must be saved, not only for their own sakes, but because, for every one saved now, there will be at least three fewer to save in the next generation.

Please help us. May I appeal specially to those who have signed the declaration and appeal in THE INQUIRER of Nov. 25? There is no description of social work which more needs doing than this. Weakness of intellect is at the root of most of our social evils, and until it is properly dealt with our social reformers will waste a great deal of their time and money and effort. I know our work is not such as looms large in the imagination of the people. Preventive work will never appeal to the world at large until we have a proper sense of our responsibility to the future; and we are a very long way from that yet. To the thoughtful, however, we make our appeal, in the confidence that they will respond if they have it in their power, and thus relieve us of one of the many anxieties which are inseparable from our undertaking.

I think, also, that we have a claim upon everybody on the ground that we have never had a bazaar or sale of work, and that we waste no money at all. Anyone examining our report will see that we get a great deal done for nothing. I shall be very glad to send our papers to anyone, and to answer any questions.

MARY DENDY,
Hon. Sec.

BOOKS OF DAILY STRENGTH.*

WHILE habits of Bible reading and family prayer are not maintained in these days as they were even a generation ago, the wide acceptance of such books as those mentioned together here is a welcome sign of the effort by different means to keep daily life in touch with the sources of devotion and inspiration. If the Bible is being less read as the accepted and habitual companion of daily life, it is in wide circles more seriously studied, and is in process of being given back to the people as a living source of power; and at the same time the larger thought of the Divine Wisdom and inspiration in all noble literature leads to an earnest search in these wider fields for the same sustenance of the deeper life, which our fathers sought more exclusively in the Bible. And while, for various reasons, there is less family prayer than of old, many manuals for daily reading, such as the best of the books mentioned here, afford ample opportunity for a few moments' quiet meditation and private prayer, either at the beginning or the end of the day.

Of the books in our list, the first and the last stand somewhat apart from the rest, the last as the most meagre, the first as wider in its scope, and also as the most beautiful in the form of it production. It will make a charming gift book for the present season.

Miss Theodora Thompson is known to many of our Liverpool readers. Her book, "Under the Bough," has a decorated cover and title-page by Mr. Anning Bell, and a frontispiece, with a symbolic figure of a girl tying up the "Posie." The selected passages are not arranged on the plan of a page for each day of the year, but, grouped in eight sections, fill altogether 444 pages. The aim is "to bring refreshment, encouragement, inspiration, and hope to those who are toiling up the steep path of life," and the character of the book is indicated by the title of the sections: "This Worldly Way," "The Law of Life" (Progress), "The Salt of Life" (Work), "A Great Love and Much Serving," "The Price of Life," "The Face of God," "Shadows Hiding Light," and "Our Great Progression." The selections are made from nearly 400 authors: Browning, Emerson, Lowell, Stevenson, and Whittier, Channing, and Stopford Brooke, Dresser, Henry Drummond, George MacDonald and Walt Whitman being among those most largely drawn upon, together with Hugh Black, James Brierley, Gannett, J. Ll. Jones, and M. J. Savage, Elizabeth Gibson, E. H. Griggs, G. S. Merriam, and Charles Wagner. That is sufficient to show the freshness and variety of this selection which we welcome as a delightful addition to our store of such books.

"Character and Conduct" may be also classed as a Liverpool book; for, although the preface is dated from Arnside, Miss Whishaw is the daughter of a former chaplain of the Church of the Blind in Liverpool, and she was for many years resident at New Brighton. Her former book of the kind, "Being and Doing," has had a very wide circulation, and the quality of this later work may be judged from the fact that, first published in November, 1904, a third edition was issued within two months, making 6,000 copies in all. Here again, Emerson figures largely, and Henry Drummond, while among other of the writers chiefly drawn upon are Amiel, Phillips Brooks, John Watson, and Bishop Westcott. In the index we note "Martineau" and "J. Martineau" separately entered, but the passages are all three his. The daily selections here are of very unequal length. One page is crowded with a long passage from Herbert Spencer's "Education," others have only a few lines. The last day gives Tennyson's "Ring out, wild bells"; Nov. 3, the great passage from Browning's "Abt Vogler," "Therefore, to whom turn I but to Thee, the ineffable Name?" There is plenty of less familiar matter, including a good many quotations from the Rev. Henry Latham's "Pastor Pastorum."

"The Pilot" is a charming little book of great excellence. In limp leather binding, and printed on India paper, which brings it into wonderfully small compass, it slips easily into the pocket, and may well become a treasured companion. The selections are from 292 authors, where names are given, but there are a number of anonymous passages from a "Note Book," a good many of them of rather poor quality. On the other hand, the prayers, of which 41 are scattered among the selections for daily reading, and of which nothing is said in the preface, have the tone of a deep and true devotion, and, even among those whose theology is less involved than that of the writer, will meet with an earnest response. The book is anonymous, but we take it to be the work of a refined and well-read Congregational minister. Here also Browning, Stevenson, and Whittier hold high rank; but for Emerson we have Erskine, and for John Watson, Dr. Mackennal, among the writers most largely drawn upon With these, Tennyson, Ruskin, and Walter C. Smith also rank.

Another anonymous book is the "Daily Message," published by Mr. Allenson. It is interesting and helpful, but in quality not quite up to those already mentioned.

Miss Soulsby's "Wings and Spurs" ("Joys are our wings; sorrows are our spurs"), printed originally in 1901 as a private Christmas card, is now published because of the warm response with which it met. There is only a short quotation for each day, the shortest on January 3, "His will is our peace." A week's quotations go on to a single page, and the alternate pages are blank, so that anyone could add further matter of his own choice. Sometimes a page is all from one writer, such as Dante, Emerson, MacDonald, Stevenson, George Eliot, Marcus Aurelius, Jeremy Taylor, Tennyson, Wordsworth; there are 33 such pages; on the others various writers appear. The book is in large octavo size, with paper covers.

"An Ethical Calendar" also has quotations for seven days on a page; none are more than six lines in length, and one is only three words, "Thoughts are things." Among other of the shortest, from which the quality of the book may be judged, are these: "The universe is a thought of God," "Do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God," "Children, obey your parents," "Be ye kind one to another," "Every cloud has a silver lining," "A loud laugh bespeaks a vacant mind," "They always talk who never think," "Thinking is a divine service," "There is endless hope in work."

ENGLISH PHILANTHROPY.*

MR. KIRKMAN GRAY'S "History of English Philanthropy," is full of human interest, and will be of permanent value, for it is compact of information as to the period which it covers, well arranged, with abundant references, so as to invite further study. It raises on the cover, indeed, an expectation which is not fulfilled, but the title-page at once explains that it is only a period of the history that is here dealt with, from the dissolution of the monasteries to the close of the eighteenth century. "The time for writing the history of the nineteenth century philanthropy," Mr. Gray says in his concluding chapter, "is not yet. Its problems are too far from being solved, or even from being understood." And we do not gather that he expects the time to come in his day, so that any further studies from his pen will be on different lines.

"Charity and the Elizabethan Poor Law" is the title of Mr. Gray's first chapter. The dissolution of the monasteries by Henry VIII. brought a radical change in the condition of the poor, who had depended so greatly on the religious houses, and at the same time threw upon the world and their own resources large numbers of poor and ignorant monks and nuns. Mr. Gray gives a most interesting account of what was done to meet the need, in the foundation of hospitals and charity schools, the provision of doles and other forms of help. He notes in particular one characteristic of this first division of his period, down to the time of the Civil War, that a distinct effort was made to face the serious problem of unemployment by providing work for the destitute—an effort and aim afterwards lost sight of until much more recent times. One remark he makes in passing on the general character of philanthropic endeavour. The maintenance of roads had been largely in the hands of the monasteries; it had been to their interest to keep the roads in proper repair, and this was an object of frequent pious bequest from early times. But such a method was clearly not adequate; the work could only be effectually done as a public charge. "It was not, in fact, until the roads did come in reality under the activity of local government that they became other than a disgrace. The defect to which we draw attention in the psychology of charity is that philanthropists, while often quick to discover evils that need a remedy, are constantly under the illusion that a mere casual act of goodwill is sufficient to supply the need. If the records of philanthropy are strewn with monuments of failure, it is because the charitably minded characteristically lack a due sense of proportion, and while they are able to see the end that is to be attained, yet cannot command the means to achieve it." Admirable examples of the vivid touches of human interest in Mr. Gray's narrative will be found in the account of what James Bamford did in the time of plague, and of the work of the Rev. Abraham Colfe, of Lewisham, and of the community of Little Gidding, with which readers of John Inglesant have been made familiar.

The confusions of the Civil War and the Commonwealth time brought a check to the development of philanthropic enterprise, and particularly in the matter of providing work for the unemployed. After the Restoration new forces came into play, and it is with the eighteenth century that the greater part of Mr. Gray's history is concerned. "This period," he says, "is signalised by the discovery of a new philanthropic instrument of first-class importance. The eighteenth century is the century above all of the voluntary subscriber and the private philanthropic institution. This new method led to great and very various extensions of philanthropic enterprise, and the stream of charity which had formerly flowed in a few channels was then diffused in very many." We have here an account of the origin and development of the great religious societies, such as that for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge and of the great hospitals. Full justice is done to the philanthropic efforts of Thomas Firmin. One of the most interesting chapters is on "The Philanthropist as Agitator," telling first of the efforts for prison reform from the time of Firmin and Oglethorpe to John Howard, and then of the fight against the slave trade. It is difficult for us to realise that in the time of Granville Sharp there was in London a negro population estimated at from 14,000 to 15,000. The agitation cast a light not only upon the iniquities of slavery but incidentally upon the condition of the poor in this country. It was argued on the slaveholders' side that the condition of the slaves was often as good if not better than that of the free labourer in England; then people were compelled to consider what that condition really was, and it was shown to be intolerable.

In studying the various efforts of the eighteenth century, Mr. Gray is led to a conclusion differing from that of Mr. Lecky, who divides the century into three periods, of which the middle period was marked, in his view, by a lack of that enthusiasm for philanthropy which produced the "Clerical reaction" of Anne's reign, and was untouched as yet by the reforming spirit of the later time. Mr. Gray's judgment is different: "It is hardly possible to regard these years—1714-1760—as barren, when it is remembered that they can claim all the London general hospitals of the century, the only Foundling Hospital, the first dispensaries, the early penitentiaries for girls and reformatories for boys, besides orphanages for children, hospitals for special diseases, and numerous charities founded by the foreign residents in London, not without aid from British subscribers. These same years also witnessed the earlier provincial hospitals, and although these became more numerous during the reign of George III., this is no more than might be expected in a movement that naturally gathers momentum as it proceeds."

On Dec. 31, 1800, Royal assent was given to the Act for holding the first census, and this Mr. Gray takes as marking the conclusion of his period. He notes it as "the first official recognition of the duty of the State to know in detail the vital, cultural, and economic condition of the whole nation : : . And social knowledge, which is itself a kind of social action, impels of necessity to much doing of many sorts." Thus, in conclusion, he casts a glance into the nineteenth century, in which the principle of State intervention was brought into prominence, as, in the eighteenth, that of voluntary association. By that distinction he indicates his conviction of the way in which a permanent bettering of the condition of the people must be sought.

This notice does but scanty justice to the thoroughness and great value of Mr. Gray's work. We trust, however, that it may be sufficient to send many interested readers to his book.

WALT WHITMAN.*

TWENTY-TWO years ago we wrote in these columns a review of Walt Whitman's "Specimen Days and Collect," the volume of prose published in 1882 by Rees Welsh, of Philadelphia. There was a wonderful vividness in Whitman's narrative of what he had done in the hospitals in war time, and an impression of personal power and deep human sympathy, which were very attractive; and while in his poetry their was much that was strange and wearisome, and some things utterly distasteful, yet one had the feeling always that this was a man not to be neglected. Enthusiasts might make exaggerated claims, but on the other side ridicule was as little justified. There were deep notes of undoubted beauty in this singer, and the strong impulse of new life in the man. We have always desired to enter more fully into the secret of his power and the knowledge of his mind, and therefore have turned with the keenest interest to Mr. Binns's "Life."

It is altogether the most thorough and the best informed book on the subject that has been offered to English readers. Mr. Binns is an enthusiastic believer in Whitman, whom he recognises not only as an original poet, but as a mystic and prophet of the new life. With the greatest diligence he has searched the records, and, though he never saw Whitman himself, he has had personal intercourse with the poet's most intimate friends, and has visited the scenes of his boyhood and later life.

Thus we have first-hand pictures of these drawn with a loving hand and a poet's insight, and at the same time a very capable study of the whole historical setting of Whitman's life. Indeed, a captious critic might be inclined to say that there was more digression in the provision of historical setting, as regards American politics and the fortunes of the war, than the due proportions of a simple biography required. But Mr. Binns is so much in earnest, and so anxious that every possible light shall be thrown upon the character of his subject, that no one who is really interested and attracted will grudge the fulness of this apparatus. Mr. Binns speaks modestly of his work, as making no attempt to fill the place either of a critical study or a definitive biography of Whitman, and says that the time has not yet come for the final and complete life to be written. But really we cannot see that there is more to be said. What is now required is that with the help Mr. Binns has furnished Whitman himself should be read.

We had hoped to publish this week a full review of the book, but limits of space and time both forbid. We must be content now simply to call attention to its great interest and to congratulate Mr. Binns upon his achievement. In the New Year we must return to a further study of its subject. One erratum we may note here, in the first line of p. 19, for ever read never. Mr. Binns's enthusiasm is marked also by the number of illustrations he has added to his book. We confess we could have spared the portraits of Doyle and Ingersoll and one or two others, but the series of Whitman portraits is admirable, though we cannot believe that the picture of his mother does her justice. There are nine portraits of Whitman himself.

IF you want to produce good work, do not think too much of what the world will say to-morrow. Do and speak as if you felt that God was revealing something through you, and your mind will be healthy and cheerful; and, being so, you will have power to do your best.—Stopford A. Brooke.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Contemporary is a strong number. It opens with an account by Mr. W. T. Stead, who was on the spot, of the "Resurrection of Finland"; but much the most striking Russian article is the account by Mr. B. Pares of "A Peasants' Meeting in Russia." If such characteristics as were displayed in that meeting could dominate the popular movement in the country, there would be great hope for the issue out of the dreadful confusions of the present time. Dr. Dillon also writes on "Russia in Revolution," and in the Nineteenth Century Prince Kropotkin on "The Revolution in Russia." That the present movement will be victorious, he is confident—or at any rate was so on Nov. 21. "The years of disturbance will pass, and Russia will come out of them a new nation; a nation owning an unfathomed wealth of natural resources, and capable of utilising them; ready to seek the ways for utilising them in the best interest of all; a nation averse to bloodshed, averse to war, and ready to march towards the higher goals of progress. One of her worst inheritances from a dark past, autocracy, lies already mortally wounded, and will not revive; and other victories will follow."

Sir John Macdonell writes in the Contemporary on "The Future Hague Conference," urging that the next achievement must be to secure immunity of private property at sea from capture, and incidentally remarks that it may be "there is an end of the Christian hegemony of the world, not incompatible with an improvement in the Christian practices of nations." Mr. Herbert Samuel's article on "The Congo State" should be noted, and also Mr. W. Maitland's plea for the Chinaman, based on experience in California, and protesting against the iniquitous treatment he receives in the Transvaal. "Poor-Relief in Berlin," by Miss Edith Sellers, is also valuable, and Miss Caillard, in an article on "The Relation of Theology and Religion," continues her thoughtful consideration of the deepest questions.

Other articles of special interest in the Nineteenth Century and After are the Rev. W. Carlile's on "Continental Light on the 'Unemployed' Problem" (suggesting more discrimination and the employment of paupers in remunerative work, together with strict enforcement of the laws against vagrancy and begging), Miss Octavia Hill's on "Natural Beauty as a National Asset," and the Countess of Jersey's on "Children's Happy Evenings."

In the Independent Review, Mr. H. G. Wells, writing a parable on "The Misery of Boots," looks to Socialism as the only way out of present troubles, and declares that it must be faced. "Cling to the simple essential idea of Socialism," he pleads, "which is the abolition of private property in anything but what a man has earned or made." There is an article by Mr. H. B. Marriott Watson on "The Unknown God," a subject on which he certainly does not say the last word. We may be very dull, but we cannot see anything in the clever vulgarity of "Sly's Awakening," by H. W. Nevinson, which justifies its inclusion in such a review as the Independent.

The World's Work and Play, which is now three years old, opens with an interesting article on the magazine itself, "How it is Produced," fully illustrated, and with portrait of the editor, Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., as frontispiece. In the same number we may read how to keep "Christmas without Flesh-Eating."

FURTHER NOTICE.

THE special claim of the New Hymnal upon our gratitude is that there is a musical edition. This will be of great service where the book is adopted for congregational use (as it is already, we understand, in seven of our churches), and it will secure for the hymnal a warm welcome in many of our homes. The book, naturally, is far from perfect, but great pains have been spent upon the musical edition, and it contains a large number of thoroughly good tunes put to the right hymns. That every one will find exceptions is, of course, inevitable, and there are among the tunes, as well as in the hymns themselves, some astonishing things. To a certain extent the Editors disarm criticism by acknowledging that the difficulty of copyright has in some cases prevented the best tune from being used. Is this, we wonder, the reason why Havergal (Bristol 741) is not put to "O Thou, not made with hands"? Any other tune seems to us intolerable, and there are two offered in this book. The same we should say of Silverstone (Bristol), for "O holy Father, Friend unseen," and St. Vincent (A. and M.), for "O blessed life! the heart at rest." In other instances the situation is saved by the right tune appearing elsewhere in the book, e.g., Dykes's St. Cuthbert (159), for "The God of love my Shepherd is," and Moscow (594), for "Come, Holy One, in love." So also with "Angels holy," where the anonymous tune offered in the book rouses hot indignation, but Farmer's well-known tune is given as an alternative in the appendix. But surely this appendix of seven tunes ought to be enlarged, to include at least the Ogden tunes to "When Spring unlocks the flowers" (how can one sing that hymn to anything else!), and "O my soul, with all thy powers." Dykes's St. Agnes is already put down for seven hymns, but we should use it also for Whittier's "All as God wills! Who wisely heeds," and there are a good many other cases where the presence of the right tune elsewhere in the book enables one to escape without much trouble from the Editors' tyranny. It is perhaps an irregularity, but we rejoice to be able to do this with the Whitsuntide hymn, "Mighty Spirit, gracious Guide," by using Monk's Vigilate (247). The only piece of thoroughly bad taste which we have discovered in the book (beyond the innocent differences of opinion above indicated) is in tune 585, which presses a very popular German Volkslied, "Ach, wie ist's möglich dann," into the service. We doubt, also, whether the facile prettiness of the tune provided is worthy of Tennyson's "Ring out, wild bells."

At the same time, when all deductions have been made, we repeat that this is a most excellent book. It contains 468 tunes for the 658 hymns, and only uses the very best tunes more than once or twice. About 220 composers of tunes are represented, Barnby, Dykes, and Sullivan being by far the largest contributors. Forty-four of the tunes have been specially written for this book, and ten of them by Mr. Granville Bantock (Principal of the Birmingham School of Music), to whom the Editors are also indebted for the revision of other tunes. His tune to Kipling's Recessional appears to us his most notable contribution to the book, but there is an even finer tune in Mr. Garrett Horder's "Worship Song." Among the special contributors is also "S. K." who has seven tunes. He is al o a writer of hymns, but we prefer his tunes. Note especially 31 and 98. Mr. John Harrison and the Rev. F. A. Horner are also in this list, each contributing two tunes.

But we must not linger longer over this book. We are confident that its merits will meet with growing appreciation both in our homes and churches.

On August 12 we gave a list of corrections for the Index of Authors. Here are a few more:—

Omit "A. Burnett" and add hymn 239 to A. Bennett.

Under Milton, for 6 read 65.

Under Sadler, omit 514, and add (as in the text) Ann Taylor's name, with this hymn (or is it by her sister Jane?).

Hymn 241 is not by S. J. Williams, but another Sarah Williams.

Add "Catherine Winkworth" (1827–78), translator of 32 and 218.

In the next edition of the Hymnal, either 400 or 436 should be omitted, and Martineau's "Thy way is in the deep, O Lord," should surely have a different place.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XXXI.

THAT is a curious passage in the Preface to Watts's "Psalms of David imitated in the language of the New Testament," in which the writer says that his design has been to teach his author to speak like a Christian. In another place he says, "I have expressed myself, as I may suppose David would have done, had he lived in the days of Christianity," and again, "I have done no more in this paraphrase than what I'm persuaded the Psalmist himself would have done in the time of Christianity." This may be very well for Christianity, but is it quite fair to Hebrew poetry? David is not "imitated," not in the sense in which Horace and Juvenal have been "imitated" by English poets. The original poems are taken, root and stock, as they stand, and are lopped off here and there for the insertion of Christian doctrine and Christian sentiment. Starting as paraphrase, each version is made to receive in the end an evangelical turn. Thus the first two psalms grow into hymns on the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Christ. Another is not released until it has told u how

The frowning scribes and angry priests
In vain their impious cavils bring.

An ode to the glory of Jehovah, first in Creation, and afterwards in the Law, becomes a triumphant song on "the glory and success of the Gospel." Worst of all, the great Miserere, with its passionate seeking after spiritual sacrifice, is diverted into an expression of that very conception of sacrifice from which it had tried to set itself free:

Jesus, my God, thy blood alone
Hath pow'r sufficient to atone;
Thy blood can make me white as snow;
No Jewish type could cleanse me so.

If the religious application rises, what shall we say of the literary bathos of a verse like this:

The sparrow chooses where to rest,
And for her young provides her nest;
But will my God to sparrows grant
That pleasure which his children want?

Or of lines such as these:

Sing to the Lord with joyful voice;
Let every land his name adore;
The British isles shall send the noise
Across the ocean to the shore.

Thus does David learn to speak like a Christian, with the further advantage of feeling like an Englishman. Even Marot, who in Calvin's time had turned some of the Psalms of David into songs for the ladies of the French Court, was careful to respect the nationality of the psalmist, and to assure the fair singers that he had not departed from the sense of the original Hebrew.

Watts's audacious violence is the more surprising when we think of the tender delicacy with which those same poems had hitherto been handled by compilers of Christian psalmody. They too might well have stumbled over the new moons and the ritual of the temple, the bulls of Bashan and bows of steel, the harps and timbrels, cymbals and psalteries, at which Watts in his day took offence. They also must have felt like him the inappropriateness of reference to David's enemies, and the strain of all attempt to repeat in any personal way his confessions, imprecations, and complaints. Yet would they leave everything untouched, even in the selection of special psalms for the great Festivals of the Christian year. The "Proper Psalms" were taken from the Psalter without omission or alteration, though some of their expressions were little in keeping with the particular subject of the day. There can be little doubt that this delicacy arose, partly from right regard for the integrity of literary composition, and partly from belief in the power of every Christian worshipper to spiritualise things natural for himself. It was thought that he could share David's exultation, without taking too literally the new moons and the musical instruments, and think of spiritual adversaries, when he recited the names of Gebal and Ammon and Amalek.

Watts has found many followers, and they too have taught their authors to speak as they think they would better have spoken. The knack of tampering is now one of the religious arts. To all who have the skill, it is open to take an unprotected hymn, and forthwith to mend its structure, change its meaning, and pervert its use. Yet, in dealing with profane literature, tampering is the unpardonable sin. Every jot and tittle of an ancient text must be preserved, and the very thought of emendation is sacrilege. I have often wondered why an old hymn should be less respected than an old ballad. Surely the writer has an equal right to say the thing he has to say in his own way, instead of being deliberately made to say that which he deliberately chose not to say, and presented as silent on the very points he most endeavoured to express. Every hymn has its main intention, and, if this be deflected or suppressed, it suffers that outrage which every work of art suffers when it is no longer allowed to be a memorial of its own time, but is chipped or patched or polished into an example of something else. It has been argued that "every adaptation of Jewish psalm to Christian worship affords an instance of theological accommodation." But where are these adaptations and accommodations to be found? Certainly not in the Prayer-book Psalter, nor in the metrical versions of Sternhold and Hopkins, and afterwards of Brady and Tate, nor in the paraphrases of the Scottish Church. In all these cases the Psalms of David have been adopted, not adapted, and adopted together with those inconvenient blemishes and imperfections which accommodation would have removed. To honest borrowing there is no bar, and there is perhaps no existing form of worship which has not been enriched thereby, but to confuse the history, and indoctrinate the doctrine, of religious poems is to refuse to sacred song that sacredness which is allowed to every other product of human thought. I am tempted to add that a faith which cannot make its own independent psalmody is not a living faith.

THE ADAPTATION OF HYMNS.

A VIEW of the ethics of adaptation in the use of hymns for public worship, diametrically opposed to that of the above "Musing," Dr. Martineau expressed in his preface to "Hymns of Praise and Prayer." To set the two views side by side we quote the passage here:—

"The religious conditions under which this book is produced have determined the literary principles followed in its compilation. It is offered to a Nonconformist Broad Church by an editor whose prevailing feeling carries him less to Broad Church sources than to other springs—Catholic, Mystical, Semipuritan, Lutheran, Wesleyan—and gives him, therefore, what he most loves, and what speaks most truly for him, mingled with much which neither he nor his readers can believe. May he drop this impossible element and save the rest? Or is he bound to forego the whole and accept his silent exile from a chorus in which he longs to join, and which gives him a voice infinitely better than his own? The common-sense of Christendom has rightly recognised a rule between these two extremes. Of ancient Latin hymns, successive versions exist, and those of the eighth century were re-written for the sixteenth. Many a sacred poem (like 'Jerusalem, my happy home') has a long literary history of change. In common with earlier Christians, who turned the psalter to their use, Watts altered David, and Wesley altered Watts. Jeremy Taylor, as well as Tate and Brady, was corrected by Bishop Heber; George Herbert by Bishop Horne; and the Moravian hymns appear in their successive editions with various transformations. In the absence of this liberty there could be no literature of devotion common to Christendom. If the original texts were all stereotyped, while new impulses awoke and new thoughts were born, and worship began to speak in tones unheard before, the whole continuity and Catholicity of religious life would be broken; the old inheritance of sacred influence would be struck with paralysis; a fresh library of piety, a separate school of spiritual culture, would be set up for every little community; and for the grave and lofty speech of a universal devotion we should have a grotesque assemblage of provincial eccentricities. The whole hope of any gathering together of Christians in a comprehensive 'City of God' depends on a gradual falling away of transitory from permanent elements in the sacra transmitted from the past, and they can never be sifted out, and lay bare the imperishable residuum unless each communion is free to take what it can from the life of the rest, and so test the real range of possible sympathy.

"With a generous abnegation of literary rights, the late Dr. John Mason Neale did not hesitate to say that a hymn, whether original or translated, ought, from the moment it is published, to be the common property of Christendom; and, in preparing a last volume on his death-bed, he was moved by the desire to contribute 'such hymns as might perhaps, with more or less alteration, be not unsuitable for the worship of the Church.'* Without insisting on a rule of such unselfish latitude, limits must be assigned to an author's posthumous control over the form of his productions, and the liberty be given to harmonise them with the wants of growing Churches."

Yet in that book, Dr. Martineau added, the liberty had been used under rigorous restraint, and with careful acknowledgment in every instance, of the changes made:

"Deviations from the original texts have been kept down to the lowest possible amount, and, unless occasionally imposed by metrical necessity, admitted only for grave reasons of religious veracity. Of mere arbitrary tampering with the materials which it is my duty and delight to touch with only a reverent hand, I trust no trace will be found."

A similar avowal on this subject will be found in the Preface to the new edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern" (1904), where the Editors, after speaking of the great care which has been taken to secure the most authentic text available, add:—

"But the Revisers have felt that they were preparing a hymn-book for use in public worship, and not an anthology of sacred verse for purposes of study. Wherever, therefore, an alteration of the original, which had been long in current use, seemed to them a real improvement upon the original, they have not hesitated to perpetuate it. In some hymns they have deliberately made changes with this practical end in view."

OBITUARY.

MRS GROSVENOR TALBOT.

IT was a happy day for Mill Hill Chapel when, some sixty years ago, Mr. Joseph Cliff came under the spell of the preaching of the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, and after much thought and questioning, finally recognised that he had reached the Unitarian position, and took sittings for himself and his family, under the minister to whom he owed his new faith. He himself grew old in faithful attendance at the chapel, his large white head and full voice, distinguishing him among many venerable men there. Of the boys and girls he brought with him, some grew up in Leeds to be an honour and support to the chapel of their father's choice. But two of the daughters were specially distinguished in the congregation by their ability and zeal. They were Sunday School teachers, and married the two youthful superintendents of the boys' school. One of them, the wife of the present Sir James Kitson, died many years ago, but there are not wanting those who knew her, and those who only know her by report who still lament the loss to us all by her death. The other, well known to all Yorkshire Unitarians and respected, both for her husband's sake and her own, was Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot, who has just been taken from us in her sixty-sixth year. She came to Mill Hill as a little girl, and she there learnt from Mr. Wicksteed and Mr. Hincks the faith which was her stay and comfort to the end of her life. She was never absent from public worship without good and sufficient reason, and to the very last she maintained her interest in the place which was hallowed to her as the House of Prayer. "I see Mill Hill quite clearly," she said a few days before she died, "and all the people there." She was interested in everybody and everything connected with the congregation, and always ready to help even beyond her power. She had something of a statesman's grip of facts and talent of organisation and capacity of judgment, and with these high and worthy qualities she had all of a good woman's sympathy and sweetness and tact. This combination of strength and gentleness made her invaluable when help and advice was wanted in exceptional undertakings, and it is no reflection on the many who worked so well with her to say that the great success of our Union Bazaar of 1903 was due to her energy. We were divided in council, some advising to aim low and insure against failure, others fearful of responsibility, till she took hold and straightway all doubts and disunion vanished, and every difficulty was overcome and we succeeded beyond our hopes. She was a convinced Unitarian and willing to help in every way to make known to others the faith which satisfied her own soul, but she united in a degree more than common even among us the broadest charity with the most determined faith. Difference of opinion made no difference to her friendship, and among the crowd of rich and poor who attended her funeral were clergy of the Established Church, present probably for the first time of their lives at a Unitarian service. It would be long to enumerate all the good causes she worked for as occasion demanded, for her interests were wide and her help was never wanting when sought for, it was never half hearted.

Her life closed with eighteen months of sore sickness and compulsory inaction, but to the last she was true to her character and her faith, and her unfailing sweetness and patience were the admiration of those whose privilege it was to wait on her.

SHORT NOTICES.

THE Moral Instruction League is doing admirable service by its issue of books to help parents and teachers in the giving of useful ethical lessons. The last of these books that has come into our hands is The Garden of Childhood, Stories for Little Folk at School and at Home, by Alice M. Chesterton. The stories are intended to illustrate the lessons outlined for infants in the "Graduated Syllabus for Moral Instruction for Elementary Schools," which is printed at the end of the book, and which we published some time ago in these columns Miss Chesterton is a good story-teller, and the book is well illustrated by Miss G. M. Bradley. (Sonnenschein & Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

Another book that has been highly commended is A Teacher's Handbook of Moral Lessons, arranged by A. J. Waldegrave, and it is already in a second edition. It also prints the "Syllabus" as an appendix, and illustrates the lessons outlined for Standard V. The lessons are sketched in outline—on Habits, Manners, Patriotism Justice, Truthfulness, &c., and there are notes for illustrative stories (Sonnenschein & Co., 1s. 6d. net.). Three volumes of Mr. F. J. Gould's Children's Book of Moral Lessons have now been issued, and the first series is to be had also in a cheap sixpenny edition in paper covers. (Watts & Co., 2s. each.)

Kings of the Forest, by A. E. Bonser, pictured by Stanley Berkeley, contains ten large coloured plates of wild animals from the lion and tiger to the polar bear, the reindeer, the kangaroo, and the giraffe, and two others of the ostrich and the pelican. There is a page of interesting letter-press about each, with further sketches of the animals and birds; a book that will give pleasure, and quicken the eager wonder of the young children for whom it is intended (Dean & Son, 5s.)

The Rosebud Annual is amusing as ever, and is sure to be popular (James Clarke & Co., in boards 3s., in cloth 4s.). So will Louis Wain's Animal Show with Stories. (James Clarke & Co., 1s.)

Two welcome reprints are of the Life of Madame Guyon, by T. C. Upham, with a brief introduction by the Rev. W. R. Inge, and the History of Dr. John Tauler, with Twenty-five of His Sermons, translated by Susanna Winkworth, with a preface by Charles Kingsley. To this latter Whittier's poem on Tauler is now added. (H. R. Allenson, 6s. each.)

In his series of "Heart and Life Booklets," Mr. Allenson has issued John Caird's famous sermon Religion in Common Life, with a brief introduction by Jonathan Nield, Browning's Christmas Eve, and also Easter Day, a sermon by Phillips Brooks on The Purpose and Use of Comfort, and also An Easter Sermon, F. W. Robertson's The Loneliness of Christ, and a Selection from Faber's Hymns. (H. R. Allenson, 6d. net each.) We have also received a first English edition of C. F. Dole's Religion of a Gentleman. (H. R. Allenson, 3s. 6d.)

In the "Freedom of Faith Series," very attractive little books, bound in limp leather, we have received The Crucible of Experience, by F. A. Russell, The Value of the Apocrypha by Bernard J. Snell, The Passion for Souls by J. H. Jowett, The Economics of Jesus by E. Griffith-Jones, and Christ's Pathway to the Cross by J. D. Jones. If the world had not been so full of books, and a great many of them really good books, we should have been glad to notice every one of these more fully. (James Clarke & Co., 1s. 6d. net each.)

Issued in connection with the Centenary is a Short Biography of William Lloyd Garrison, by V. Tchertkoff and F. Holah, with an introductory appreciation of his life and work by Leo Tolstoy. The authors naturally lay special emphasis on Garrison's adhesion to the principle of non-resistance. (Free Age Press, 2s. 6d. net.)

The Eternal Religion, by J. Brierley, B.A., is another welcome volume of J. B.'s striking articles reprinted from the Christian World. "The Eternal Revelation," "A Layman's Religion," "Conscience," "Idle Piety," are a few of the subjects here treated. "J. B." is always worth reading. (James Clarke & Co., 6s.)

A charming little edition of William Penn's Reflections and Maxims, Some Fruits of Solitude, is issued with an introduction by Dr. Clifford. (Headley Bros., 2s. 6d. net.) From the same publishers we have an essay on Quakerism and the Simple Life, by Dr. Rufus M. Jones (6d net.).

Prayers written at Vailima, by Robert Louis Stevenson, with an introduction by Mrs. Stevenson, is a booklet slight in form but with the interest of reality. Mrs. Stevenson tells how the prayers were used in the household. They are very simple and direct. "Let peace abound in our small company. Purge out of every heart the lurking grudge. Give us grace and strength to forbear and to persevere. . . Give us courage and gaiety and the quiet mind." "Deliver us from fear and favour; from mean hopes and cheap pleasures. Have mercy on each in his deficiency." (Chatto & Windus, 1s. net.)

A miniature edition of Carlyle's Heroes and Hero Worship, printed on India paper in beautifully clear type and bound in limp leather, is very pleasant to use. (H. R. Allenson, 2s. 6d. net.)

Edmund Burke: Apostle of Justice and Liberty, by T. Dundas Pillans, is a volume of selections (with slight accompanying editorial essays) from the writings and speeches of the great statesman. The selections are made from Burke's utterances or written words concerning the revolt of the American colonies, Indian affairs, the French Revolution, and the constitutional principles of government at home. The editor, in his "concluding remarks," commends his anthology to all adherents to the principle "of individual initiative and energy," who will find in Burke's pages "a never-failing source of inspiration and encouragement in resisting the socialistic tendencies of the age—the deadliest and most insidious danger that has ever threatened the liberty and progress of mankind." The selections have been made with judgment and taste. Mr. Pillans can recognise both literary force and eloquence. It would not have been difficult, however, to present Burke's fundamental ideas in a more burning focus. (Watts & Co.)

The Rev. G. A. Payne's Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford, with a brief introduction by "Edna Lyall," published five years ago, was very favourably received, and we are glad to see that a second edition is now issued. The book is well illustrated, and has a reproduction of the beautiful Richmond portrait as frontispiece. Mr. Payne has added some "Cranford Notes" to this edition. (Manchester: Clarkson and Griffiths, 65, Bridge-street. London: Mackie and Co., 57, Fleet-street. 2s. 6d. By post 2s. 8d.)

Among recent publications of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the most substantial is a new edition of Professor Albert Réville's History of the Dogma of the Deity of Jesus Christ, a revised translation of the third French edition of 1904. The book has long been well known and valued for its lucid sketch of the development of doctrine in the Church, and in substance it remains what it was in the previous edition. (2s. 6d. net.)

The Sunday-school Association have issued the annual volume of Young Days, which is full of good things for the children (1s. 6d. net), and a new and cheaper edition of Dr. Brooke Herford's Bible Stories Retold, with nine line drawings by Miss Alice M. Odgers, and the well-known picture of Moses in the bulrushes as frontispiece. The drawings will doubtless serve to quicken the children's interest in the old stories (1s. net, postage 3d.).

An envelope containing twelve Hymn Cards for Infant Classes is also very welcome. Such well-known hymns as "Courage, Brother," "Love at Home," "Father, lead me day by day," are printed in clear, bold type on strong cards. (S.S.A. 3d. net, postage 1d.)

THE WINTER SUN.

As some dismantled bark turns home,
And closely hugs the welcome shore;
Fearful too far to roam,
Tempting the main no more—

The shorn red sun strays dubious out
What course, these wintry days, to urge,
Coasting, all day, about
The close horizon's verge.

Or like, amidst grey ashes cold,
A cheerless, slowly smouldering fire;
Too dull to fuse his gold,
Too heavy to rise higher.

And as beneath the embers' weight
A sinking fire sheds ruddier blaze,
The sinking sun grows great,
And crimsons all the haze.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

TO-MORROW week will be Christmas Eve, and how glad all the children will be! I expect a great many are busy now getting ready surprises for the others, and planning ways of making it a very happy time, both for all the home people, and for others as well. Children can do so much, and the elders can do a great deal more, in quiet ways, to send messages of loving-kindness to the sorrowful and poor and lonely, to those who have dull and uninteresting lives and are able to get for themselves very few beautiful things. To them the surprise even of the simplest gift, or a little act of unselfish kindness, means a great deal, and certainly those who are busy preparing such things, and thinking most of all how to make other people happy, are themselves the happiest at Christmas time.

But I am not going to say any more about that to-day. I want to ask you now to look at a hymn which is very good to think about at this time. It puts, in a few words easy to remember, the great truth of our life—that duty must always come first, and be made perfect in love. That is what Jesus taught, and when we understand it we know best of all how much reason we have to be glad and to give thanks, as we do especially at Christmas time, for his coming into the world.

One November afternoon, twenty-five years ago, when I was a very young minister at Nottingham, I went into a house, which was like a beautiful haven of peace, because of the lady who lived there. No one could go and see her without learning some new lesson of wisdom and gentleness and loving-kindness. She was very old, more than eighty then, and she lived to be ninety-seven. She was eight years older than Dr. Martineau, who was her cousin. And that afternoon she talked to me about Dr. Martineau's hymn-book, which was very precious to her, and she read this one hymn to me in such a way that I have never forgotten it. She said it would make a very good sermon for Christmas, picturing the two great teachers—John the Baptist, with his stern call to the people to be righteous, and Jesus, who cared just as much about righteousness and duty as John, but showed in a deeper and more beautiful way how duty must be done with love.

This is the hymn, which was written by Samuel Longfellow, the poet's younger brother:—

A voice by Jordan's shore!
A summons stern and clear—
Reform! be just! and sin no more!
God's judgment draweth near!

A voice by Galilee,
A holier voice I hear—
Love God! thy neighbour love! for see,
God's mercy draweth near!

O voice of Duty! still Speak forth; I hear with awe;
In thee I own the sovereign will,
Obey thy sovereign law.

Thou higher voice of Love!
Yet speak thy word in me;
Through Duty, let me upward move
To thy pure liberty!

It is quite true that the law of duty is stern, and, if we disobey, we feel God's judgment in the misery and shame of our wrong-doing, and the penalties we have to bear. But if we learn to love things that are beautiful and good, and especially to love those whom we have to live with and help to live a good life, then it is a great happiness always to do right; we no longer feel the sternness of it, but only the joy of living in that true way. And we should never think of God only as a stern judge. We know—and we are, really, at the bottom of our hearts, glad to know—that our Father is stern when we do wrong; but He is our Father still, with a great and very tender love for His children, and that helps us most of all to be brave and patient to do the right. So our Father's law of Love lifts us into its "pure liberty" and makes it easy for us to do right, and, through duty, gives us the great joy of life. Love always is our duty and makes the true way clear to us. It was the secret of the life of Jesus, who is our best teacher. It is the secret of the truest happiness, which we may all share in the rejoicing of this Christmas time.

A NEW STORY-BOOK.*

I WANT to tell the children about this new story-book, which I am sure many of them would like to have. They are not new stories, but were written long ago by Miss Anna Bright, of Liverpool, who was afterwards Mrs. Weir. Most of them were published in the old "Sunday School Magazine," and one, the story of St. Christopher, was published twenty-four years ago as one of Dr. Brooke Herford's "Home Pages." Mrs. Weir died at Malvern last year, and many friends will be glad that these stories, which they enjoyed in the old days, are now collected in a volume, which they can read to their children. They will remember her other beautiful little book, "Echoes of Holy Thoughts," which had in it some recollections of the wonderful communion addresses of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom; for she grew up as a member of the Renshaw-street congregation in Liverpool, and had a great reverence and love for Mr. Thom. In one of these stories there is a description of a minister coming to christen a little baby, and what he said. That, too, is a recollection of Mr. Thom.

These stories are not so much for the very little ones as for the elder children, and among them there are some beautiful parables from nature. If you read the first story, "Willie Wee's Armchair," about the delicate little lad and his big brother, I am sure you will want to read some more. Then read the story of "Jimmy Gordon," and the next one about "The Great Wax Doll; or 'Love your Enemies.'" The one on "The Thrush's Nest" has some very good lessons about birds and kindness to dumb creatures. The longest of all is "The Nurse's Story," in chapters, each of which illustrates one of the sentences of the Lord's Prayer. That is interesting too, and has some beautiful things in it. It is a book worth getting.

ARMSTRONG MEMORIALS.

"In grateful remembrance of JAMES MARTINEAU, D.D., D.C.L., born April 21, 1805. Died January 11, 1900. Minister of this church from its erection in 1849 until his removal to London in 1857, and previously minister of the same congregation in Paradise-street Chapel, from 1832 to 1848."

Such is the inscription on the centenary memorial to Dr. MARTINEAU, placed by the congregation in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, the unveiling of which on Thursday evening we must record next week.

At the same time another memorial has been placed in the church, the dedication of which last Sunday was, by general desire, silent, in the hearts of minister and congregation, without ceremony of unveiling or direct allusion to the fact. Both memorials contain medallion portraits in white marble, and the second, in which there are symbolic figures of "Praise," and "Prayer," is inscribed: "RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG, minister of this congregation 1884 to 1905. Born February 5, 1843. Died January 4, 1905."

In the year in which he was born, the first volume of MARTINEAU'S "Endeavours after the Christian Life" was published. Three years after MARTINEAU had removed to London, ARMSTRONG was entered at University Hall, as an undergraduate student of Manchester New College. When he became minister of Hope-street Church, it was the year before MARTINEAU'S resignation, at the age of eighty, of his office as Principal of the College. When in 1887 MARTINEAU published his "Study of Religion," ARMSTRONG wrote an "Appreciation and Analysis" of that great work, which appeared first as a series of articles in these columns early in the following year, and in 1900, the year of MARTINEAU'S death, as one of CLARKE'S "Small Books on Great Subjects." In 1896 ARMSTRONG published his own essay toward fundamental religion, "GOD and the Soul," and in the preface acknowledged that to MARTINEAU he owed "more, in the realm of thought, than to any other thinker," while the veteran teacher most cordially welcomed his old pupil's work: "It is long since I have met with anything on the great topic of which it treats, so true in itself, so well-secured in its presentation of the truth."

Thus were the lives of these two linked together, in common work for the highest ends, and in close sympathy of spirit. It is a great possession, which Hope-street Church must reverently cherish, the memory of two such ministers, and it is fitly marked by the erection of these memorial tablets.

Of Mr. ARMSTRONG, the sorrow for whose loss is still so fresh, we are thankful to know that another memorial will very soon be in the hands of his friends. His eldest son, as we announced last week, has written a memoir, which, with sixteen sermons, and a beautiful photogravure portrait, will form a volume of the deepest interest, and to all who have felt the power of his life, and the beautiful influence of his more intimate ministry, will be a very precious possession. The book is to be ready immediately.

Here we simply record the fact, and in conclusion, recall some words spoken by MR. ARMSTRONG last year, on Sunday, March 13, at the unveiling of the memorial to JOHN HAMILTON THOM, in the chapel of the Liverpool Domestic Mission:—

"If you call up before you the grave, beautiful face of him whose memorial we consecrate to-night, if you listen in the chamber of memory for the exquisite intonation of his voice—what do eyes and accents seem to ask you now? What does the spirit which was behind them, if he is with us here, in spirit presence, disrobed of all that was mortal, ask you now? Are your lives devoted to that purpose of CHRIST which is for ever urgent? Are you mindful of the call which never ceases, or are you content to take to yourselves the decencies and comforts of religion in your homes, hearing no importunate call to the common service?

"Pray God for the spirit of him whom we commemorate this night, that man of mystic insight into the truths of the spirit, that steadfast teacher and practiser of the Gospel of JESUS. Pray GOD that we too, may be true to the 'Laws of Life after the Mind of CHRIST,' and faithfully bear the burden handed down alike to preachers and to people by the holy dead."

"O Thou without whom all our works are vain, Everlasting FATHER, GOD of all holiness and truth, consecrate in our hearts that gracious memory to which this night we have turned our minds and hearts. As the record of his name and life and spirit is enshrined in letters of man's device upon these walls, so may the example which he set, the purposes which he loved, be graven deep upon our souls. We consecrate to Thee, O GOD, this memorial which the eye can see: may the memorial which endures in lives made purer, in service made more devout, be consecrated within us, wrought to effective power of the spirit for the coming of Thy kingdom."

DEVELOPMENTS OF PAULINE TEACHING.

III.

CREATION AND REDEMPTION.

(Concluded.)

(iii.) THE unity of creation in the Son is not, after all, however, the important thing for the believer, save as it reacts on present faith and future hope: and the exalted language of Colossians leaps forward at once to the great restoration, i. 18–20,—

"And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. For the whole Fulness was pleased to dwell in him, and through him to reconcile all things unto himself."

What is the Fulness? It is introduced as a well-known term, needing no explanation. It was afterwards employed in the Gnostic schools to denote the entire group of æons or powers or emanations which issued from the ultimate essence of Deity as it slowly, by their aid, revealed itself to the world. But this was the technical meaning of a later day, and cannot be applied to the exalted life of Christ as head of the Church. Yet the word is probably used in relation to some wrong opinion. It is called elsewhere "the fulness of the Godhead," ii. 9, or the "fulness of God," Eph. iii. 19; and it is said to dwell in Christ "bodily." Does this word mean the physical frame of the historic Jesus? Did the Fulness pass with him from baptism to the cross? It does not appear so; it is the risen Christ who is its abode. But does not the term "bodily" point to the earthly form? Not, certainly, of necessity. It may denote nothing more than reality, contrasted with unsubstantial semblance or shadow, Col. ii. 17. Or it may signify that glorious body, Phil. iii. 21, in which the exalted Lord would subdue all things unto himself. Or yet, again, it may point to that mystic body through which all the believers had fellowship with Christ, died with him, were raised with him, lived with him a life hidden in God, or, in short, were "made full in him," Col. ii. 10, as the head of all principality and power. This high authority is still represented as something conferred on Christ, or wrought in him by his God, the Father of glory, Eph. i. 17, 20–23,—

"When he raised him from the dead, and made him to sit at his right hand in the heavenly places, far above all rule [principality], and authority, and power, and dominion [lordship], and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and he put all things in subjection under his feet, and gave him to be head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all."

This divine fulness fills the believer who has once realised "the love of Christ that passeth knowledge," Eph. iii. 19. It is with a strange sense of incongruity that we find shortly afterwards the supremacy of Christ over the church made the basis of a corresponding authority of the husband over the wife, v. 22, 23,—

"Wives, be in subjection unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife, as Christ also is the head of the Church.''

But these analogies warn us against overstraining the high imaginative language of the writer. Each relationship suggests, and in a sense completes, the other; the believer receives from Christ, as Christ receives from his God. The Fulness abides in him that it may be distributed through him to those who share his life, and are destined to attain, iv. 13,—

'' Unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ '' :

or, as it is expressed in a different figure, ii. 22,—

'' In whom ye also are builded together for a dwelling-place of God in the spirit.''

The Fulness, then, is the sum of all the spiritual gifts and powers and energies which make up the divine life of God himself. They are the ultimate medium of human salvation. For this end they are conferred on Christ as the head of the Church, not in his earthly but his heavenly state, and from him they pass to the disciple. Yet even that Fulness is still incomplete, it lacks something which the saints can themselves supply. The afflictions of Christ, at any rate, are insufficient, and the disciple must fill up in his own flesh what is lacking in the sufferings of the Lord for the Church, Col. i. 24, a conception which it is difficult to harmonise with the Pauline view of the finality of the death of Christ.

(iv.) The Christology of Colossians and Ephesians thus enlarges the scope of the activity of the '' man of heaven '' as portrayed by Paul in the great epistles. Yet the final emphasis falls, as in the apostolic thought, on God. Apart from the remarkable expression found in no other letter bearing Paul's name, '' the God of our Lord Jesus Christ,'' Eph. i. 17, the Father is throughout the source of all. It is he who frames the eternal purpose; his is the everlasting choice; from him comes every spiritual blessing; he is the giver of grace; he makes known the mystery of his will. He calls the souls whom he foreordains, loves them and quickens them, creates them as his workmanship in Christ Jesus, for good works which he has himself prepared, Eph. ii. 10. The plan of the new temple is his; he laid Christ as its corner-stone; he dwells himself in the spiritual sanctuary; to him, then, '' be glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations for ever and ever,'' Eph. iii. 21. It is in accordance with this point of view that the designation '' the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,'' employed in Rom. xv. 6, 2 Cor. i. 3, xi. 31, reappears in Eph. i. 3, and with a slightly different form in Col. i. 3, '' God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.'' Beside these should be set another Pauline phrase, '' our God and Father,'' Gal. i. 4, 1 Thess. i. 3, iii. 11, 13, with its variant, '' God our Father,'' Rom. i. 7, 1 Cor. i. 3, 2 Cor. i. 2, Col. i. 2, Eph. i. 2. And, as if to re-affirm the essential identities of thought, the distinction between God and Lord asserted in 1 Cor. viii. 6, is repeated in Eph. iv. 4–6,—

'' There is one body, and one spirit, even as also ye were called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all.''

In whatever sense, then, the Son may have combined the functions of maker as well as of Redeemer of the world, it did not impair the central truths that '' God created all things,'' Eph. iii. 9, and that his fulness is the source of all salvation.

(v.) The reader who passes from the great epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians, finds himself perplexed with new problems; the spaces and times are stretched; the spheres above seem more fully peopled; fresh glimpses are opened into the purposes and processes of God. But he is confronted with essentially the same order of thought so far as concerns the relations of God and Christ. In 1 Timothy, however, the emphasis seems changed. The writer is not concerned so much with the exaltation of the Son as with the affirmation of the Deity of the Father, his living energy, his pervading might. Observe, for instance, the significance of such phrases as these,—

'' The King eternal, incorruptible, invisible, the only God,'' 1 Tim. i. 17.

'' The living God, who is the Saviour of all men,'' 1 Tim. iv. 10.

'' God, who quickeneth all things,'' 1 Tim. vi. 13.

'' The blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in light unapproachable, whom no man hath seen, nor can see,'' 1 Tim. vi. 15–16.

The peculiar stress upon the unity, the sovereignty, the spirituality, the life-giving power of God, seems best interpreted in contrast with the Gnostic speculations to which attention has been already called. These tended to remove God from all contact with the world into the remote and inaccessible solitude of what modern philosophers sometimes call Pure Being and the Absolute. The reiteration of his faithfulness, the assertion that '' he willeth that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth,'' his gifts of grace and peace and inspiration, his love toward man, his watchful goodness to give opponents of the Gospel repentance unto the knowledge of the truth that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, finally, the constant application of the title '' Saviour '' to God (unknown in the other Pauline letters), 1 Tim. i. 1, ii. 3, iv. 10, Tit. i. 3, ii. 10, iii. 4,—all these aspects of the Divine Fatherhood have special import by way of protest against a movement to sever it in thought from the functions of creating, maintaining, and redeeming the world. But it results from this effort that the significance of Christ is relatively depressed. True, he is still the medium of a purpose and grace bestowed in him before times eternal, 2 Tim. i. 9. Though it is God '' who saved us, and called us with a holy calling,'' Christ is saviour, too, ib. i. 10, Tit. i. 4, ii. 13, iii. 6, as the actual bearer of life and incorruption through the Gospel. But he did not himself possess the deathlessness which he revealed. Only the King of kings had immortality, and between him Jesus lay the difference between deity and humanity, 1 Tim. ii. 5,—

'' For there is one God, one mediator also between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus.''

'' Of the seed of David,'' 2 Tim. ii. 8, '' risen from the dead,'' he becomes the great object of faith, and the stages of transition from the earthly to the heavenly life are rapidly summarised thus, 1 Tim. iii. 16,—

'' And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness, He who was manifested in the flesh, justified in spirit, seen of angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory.''

The '' mystery of godliness,'' like the mystery of faith, is the sum of facts through which the believer realises the life of piety or the peace of trust. It is set forth in phrases which have a sort of rude rhythm, as though they formed part of an early confession or hymn. But its significance after all is somewhat vague. '' He who was manifested in flesh ''—had he existed elsewhere before he appeared in mortal form? It may be suggested, but it is not affirmed. The resurrection, doubtless, justified him as the Messiah, no more in flesh but in spirit. So he passed on to his exalted state, enthroned at God's right hand for the homage of angels; thence went forth his name among the nations below, and there he was encompassed by the glory which was bestowed on him above.

(vi.) Beyond this heavenly glory what could faith discern? The story of redemption was not ended with a risen life hidden with Christ in God. There is yet another Pleroma to set beside the Fulness of God and Christ. There is a '' Fulness of the Times,'' Eph. i. 10, when the hour arrives to sum up all things in heaven and earth, in Christ. This is the good pleasure of his God and Father, but so intimately is the sovereignty of the Father associated with the Messiah's triumph, that the kingdom belongs now to both, Eph v.. 5, and the great surrender when the Son relinquishes his power that God may be all in all, is no more in view. This is the great hope of the future, when Christ, once manifested already, shall appear again with a glory which none can gainsay or ignore. In that glory the disciple will have his part, Col. iii. 4, and then will Christ Jesus judge the quick and the dead, 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8. But this expectation is no longer so vivid as in the days of Paul. It has ceased to heighten every exhortation, and give an intenser note to the Gospel appeal. It is no longer confidently affirmed that '' the Lord is at hand.'' '' That day '' has receded from its foremost place in the expectation of the church (compare 2 Tim. i. 12, 18; iv. 8). It is reserved at the will of the '' blessed and only Potentate,'' 1 Tim. vi. 15, who will impart of the immortality which is his alone, so that the heavenly life alike of men and the one Mediator between God and man, will be his gift. For eternal being is no created prerogative; though the faithful may rely upon it, for it has been promised even before times eternal by God who cannot lie, Tit. i. 2. And so, as we have seen, salvation is still the work of God. Do we not, however, read of the '' appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ? '' So runs the revised version of Tit. ii. 13. But the margin warns that another translation is possible, in which the epithets here assigned to one person are distributed between two, viz., "the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Where the Greek grammar allows either rendering, the choice must be made (as in the case of Rom. ix. 5), on general grounds. Opinion, therefore, is not unnaturally divided. The learned and orthodox Meyer argues that the term God is nowhere else used in these letters as a designation of Jesus, and he therefore chooses the second translation. That choice, it is true, is exposed to difficulty inasmuch as the term "appearing" seems more appropriate to the display of the Messiah's glory. But the exalted epithet "great God," not infrequent in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, belongs more naturally to God the Father, from whom, in Tit. i. 4, Jesus Christ is carefully discriminated as Saviour. So in iii. 4–6 "Jesus Christ our Saviour" is distinguished from "God our Saviour." Nevertheless, even if the title God be not assigned him, he receives the homage of the pure-hearted, 2 Tim. ii. 22, compare 19; his glory will endure for ever and ever, 2 Tim. iv. 18; and while it cannot interfere with a similar ascription of everlasting honour to "the king eternal, incorruptible, invisible," it must at least be admitted that the humanity of "the Man Christ Jesus" is capable of an elevation which brings it in the universe next to "the only God."

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

RELIGION AND MIND-ENERGY.

THE power of religion is a recognised fact. The attempt to ignore this power has proved as much a failure in this last generation as in any previous age.

What then is this power? What is there in a man's thought of God that it should give him the force to overcome temptation, to postulate a higher standard of social life, and to view the world from a changed aspect?

When speaking of religion in these terms, we recall the problem facing the scientists of to-day.

What is the power which is acting upon all material forms? What is the power which gives vital energy to every organism?

The result of scientific research has been to leave us with the conclusion that there is a vital force within each organism, and that this force has an unceasing influence, be it selective or creative, on the outward form, and is itself influenced by its environment. A conclusion which points to this inference: viz., that the only other vital energy known to us which represents any kinship to this kind of activity is what is understood by us as mind-force or mind-energy.

In a similar way, the power which works in the religious man is a mind-force, an energy within, which influences the outward action, selecting, creating, compelling, transforming. And this force, also, is influenced by its surroundings.

An analogy, then, may be traced between the vital force at work in the world and that force, which it is possible to cause to enter into the mind of man, through conscious aspiration after the Divine.

Nature is not a stranger to resemblances of this kind. The evolutionary changes throughout nature's history are repeated in the embryo man. As Haeckel expresses it, in terms which will be recognised by scientists, "Ontology is a brief and rapid recapitulation of phylogeny. . . . The individual organism reproduces in the rapid and short course of its own evolution the most important changes in form . . . through which its ancestors have passed, in the slow and long course of their paleontological evolution." Man, therefore, is not only the result of this evolution, but each individual man has passed through the change in himself.

If, therefore, in man's thought of God, there is apparently a reflection or repetition of the vital force at work in the world, we are tempted to ask whether, in the aspiration of man after the Creator, he may not be veritably bringing into action within himself the Force of the world?

In theology we find this idea always assumed. The grace of God signified a sweet and strengthening force which was to be possessed by the soul, and was one which had distinct results on the body and its actions, as has been shown by Professor James. The indwelling Spirit promised by Christ was to strengthen men for future action. In Christ (as has been represented) dwelt the fulness of God; a power through which he professed to work his miracles, and which power, he expressly intimated, could be transmitted to his disciples, if only they had strength to believe. The method of speech of "having Christ," of "possessing a new strength," points to the idea that religion has been regarded as a possession, the possession of some force added to our own, enabling us to do that which we could not do alone. The supplication for strength is indicative of this same attitude, viz., the expectation of some added force to be ours, if the gift should be granted.

There is nothing new, then, in a suggestion that associates the power of religion with the energy which animates the world. It is what the theologians have always claimed. We have, then, now to consider how the idea bears the light of modern thought.

Science is teaching that the Energy of the world operates unceasingly, that the work of creation is proceeding to-day, and that the agents in this creation are the manifold works of nature themselves. A Force akin to mind-energy is shaping and transforming the physical world.

Creation, then, is being carried on by nature at all times and in each separate part. (In the shape of generation of its own kind, it has undeniably been an instinct inherent in every organism from the origin of things.) That this instinct should take a more highly organised form in the conscious thought of man is what we may expect. To-day, men of science, in their endeavour to create life, are using all their faculties of mind for investigation and combination. Granted that they do, by combination of atoms, or gas, or fluid, produce what they term spontaneous generation. Is not the new factor at work, the mind of man? Man producing, consciously, that which has been produced by unconscious agents, all through the history of nature.

Man's mind-force has developed the faculty of Imagination. Does this increased power enable man to consciously call into action, by means of a correct knowledge of nature's laws, the vital energy of the world?

We see to-day instances of such a power. The gardener and the chemist, acting as far as they know in harmony with nature's laws, bring into action the vital forces of the natural world. The athlete, by means of systematic exercise of his muscles, excites and regulates a healthy flow of the vital forces at work in his body. The artist also, in as far as he understands the laws of beauty and harmony, arouses in man's nature the latent forces of love and devotion, heroism and passion.

We have grounds, then, for assuming that Thought, as a result of developed mind-force, is capable (when acting in harmony with nature's laws) of consciously bringing into action the energy of the universe.

If this be so. Is religion the science which has all along treated of this power?

We must remember that throughout history religion has taught and demonstrated that matter is dependent upon mind for its existence; and has proved the reality of outward appearance to be the result of mind-force within. In the religious instincts of the savage, we find, created by his imagination, personalities behind the elements—which creations had definite results upon his actions. Again we see the powers attributed to the idols by the thoughts of their worshippers exercising definite results upon the affairs of nations. The development continues, until we find the Prophet's thought stimulating the mind of man to recognise a Spiritual Presence communicating with his own spirit—a communication which is to affect, not only his conduct and attitude in daily life, but also his material welfare.

Such a view of religion causes us to understand the modern assertion, that Divinity resides in the inherent force lying at the back of man's thought; for in all these cases Man's Thought of God has evidently been the moving force.

But because we have eliminated from our conception of the Divine all that brings it into relation with the outward sense of man, we have not eliminated the Divine force itself; we have but made the mind of man an organ by means of which he consciously calls into action the Force of the Universe.

In either case, the idea of the theologian is confirmed. The Power of religion is associated with the Force that animates the world.

Furthermore we see that religious instruction was always based on this idea. By means of a certain line of thought, man was encouraged to call into action a fresh energy, and thus secure to himself a power by which he could influence the world, in its physical, as well as in its mental and moral aspects.

But we saw, in an earlier part of this paper, that when man brings into action vital force, he is acting with correct knowledge, and in harmony with nature's laws.

If then the religious man calls into action the force of the world, he must be working in accordance with natural law.

Is the thought of God a conception in harmony with the laws of nature?

Religion (viz., the attitude of man in the presence of an almighty power), like all other sciences, is the result of the deduction of man's reason from the objects presented to his senses in the world around; and the realisation by man's intellect of the laws by which these objects are governed.

The daily course of the sun, with regular recurring changes of light and darkness, cold and heat, causes in the mind of man a sense of expectation, and certainty of the return of the phenomena. And thus is aroused in him the feeling of trust. When man works in accordance with nature's laws he succeeds; but any attempt to ignore these laws entails suffering. He therefore concludes that the only reasonable attitude is that of submission to the ruling law. The "indestructibility of matter" suggests to the mind of man the thought of an undying world. Man is surrounded by signs of evolution and development—the old giving place to the new, the blossom dropping to make way for the fruit; and the idea of self-sacrifice for the general good is engendered in him. Man knows of the cleansing and recreative properties of earth, air, fire, and water. And he realises that wholeness and purity is a state of being insisted upon by nature.

Thus, by objective representation, man's mind is roused to an attitude of trust and submission; and the ideas of immortality, of self-sacrifice, and of purity are suggested to him.

Furthermore, the outlook on the world shows to man that the source of life is One. Infinitude is demonstrated to him by mathematics. He discovers a law of attraction pervading the universe. He traces progress through a long series of renewed manifestations, culminating in the personality of man.

Thus stimulated, the mind of man formulates a Thought, the Thought of God.

It follows, then, that religion must be in harmony with nature's laws, for it is the natural world and man's own being, that have roused in man the Thought of God. A conclusion which corresponds with what science is teaching as to the natural development of the brain cells affected by outward stimuli. And at the same time the language of the theologian is confirmed; the outer world and man's being are full of evidences of the presence of God.

We find, then, that it is the Attitude of Mind that realises the signs in nature of an Almighty Power (and consciously adapts itself to them) which is possessed of a power to work definite results. By it temptation is overcome; the burden of life is rolled away; death loses its sting; and all life is transformed.

We have within us, a power that works unceasingly upon our physical organs, and by means of them influences our actions. It is at the same time possible for us consciously to reinforce this power and to direct its working.

The power of religion, then, lies in the capacity it gives to man of consciously calling into action the vital forces of the world. The Thought of God is a thought so complete that it far transcends the ordinary knowledge of nature's laws. So that by means of religion, man is able to bring into action the vital forces of the world, even before his reason has intelligently grasped these laws.

How, then, does this idea (that we can reinforce the power within us and direct its working), affect the aspect of problems which have faced us since the end of last century?

The idea that heredity presents a stumbling-block to individual morality is replaced by the thought that inherited tendencies to sin being the result of mind-force in previous generations, can be equally affected by mind-force in the individual of to-day.

Again, the production of microbes in the physical organism, being, in that case again, the result of mind-energy in one direction, these same microbes may become extinct species by the counter-direction of this same mind-energy.

The knowledge that each different attitude of mind produces a corresponding change in the bodily secretions confirms the theologian's exhortation for purity of thought in order to produce purity of life.

If the concentration of the mind on any special object leads to definite results in that direction, then the answer to prayer is produced, not by the contravention of nature's law, but by its fulfilment.

A Thought, then, becomes again with us a living force. And, as of old the God-fearing man performed heroic acts and achieved mighty purposes, because of the strength he believed to have been given him from his God, so our convictions of truth again have definite results, for we realise with our later prophet that,

"All we have willed, or hoped, or dreamed of good shall exist."

We do not even need to alter our attitude from the one adopted by the religious teachers of all ages. Suffering taken as a dispensation or discipline from the Divine Hand lost its dread power. And so with us

"The Thought of Thee is mightier far
Than pain and sin and sorrow are."

But man must become conscious of infinite perfection. His mind must be stimulated by beautiful, holy, and true surroundings, so that he may employ some of his leisure in reasoning from these on to Infinite Beauty and Holiness.

To turn Thought in a certain direction is, we maintain, to create actual results. To know is to have the power to use knowledge. An idea once conceived is at the disposal of the thinker, and can fill the world with results. The vision enables the artist to paint the picture; the mind-harmonies of the master are the source of the musical symphony.

To concentrate our minds on fulness of knowledge, perfect beauty, and absolute truth is the way to realise them in life.

So, to meditate on the Infinite Thought at the back of all creation is to become partakers in that Thought. To grasp little by little the purpose of the world is to enable us to accomplish it.

And thus: Because we ask, we receive. Because we seek, we find. And in the knowledge of God we have everlasting life.

"THE MISSION OF THE QUAKERS."*

BY EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

THE great saying of Mazzini, that "Life is a mission," is true of societies as well as of individuals. A religious society only lives if it has some definite and special work to do; if, on the other hand, it inspires an antiquarian interest merely, it is fit for a museum but for little else.

My purpose this evening is to try to answer the question, What was the special work of the early Quakers, and is the work finished? Most people know of the Quakers as a quiet, harmless and somewhat peculiar people; but what the inner reason or meaning of their peculiarities may be, few have thought or cared to inquire. It will be found that the attempt to find an answer goes very deep, behind all peculiarities of belief or practice, down to the very foundations of religion itself.

A glance at the place of the Quakers in religious history will help us. They were, as we all know, a product—in some ways an extreme product—of the Reformation. From one point of view, the Reformation may be not inaptly described as the rediscovery of the worth of the individual. In the Christianity of the Middle Ages the glory of the Church is everywhere, the glory of humanity nowhere. The mediæval Church crushed the individual; Luther restored him to his native dignity. Faith was changed from a force that made man grovel before the Church into one that set him erect in a conscious and personal relation to God, giving him a new manliness, a new moral energy. The late Mr. Lecky said, in words that might well have described the Quaker faith:—

"A religion which recognises no authority between man and his Creator, which asserts at once the duty and the dignity of private judgment, and which, while deepening immeasurably the sense of individual responsibility, denudes religion of meretricious ornaments, and of most æsthetic aids, is pre-eminently a religion of men. Puritanism is the most masculine form that Christianity has yet assumed."

But much of the Puritanism of the seventeenth century was not at this level. The middle of the century was, as is well known, a time of intense interest in religion. Its controversies were in all minds, its phrases on all lips. We catch the speech of the time in the "Pilgrim's Progress"—especially, perhaps, in the character of Talkative. And this character may serve to indicate that much of the religious talking of the day lacked reality, that piety was too often hollow.

For this unreality there were several causes. The doctrine of an infallible Bible had replaced that of an infallible Church, and had driven God to a distance from men. The "Calvinistic" dogma of election and reprobation had made God inhuman, and undermined the very foundations of morality. And the ancient idea of salvation by creed rather than by life still persisted.

There is abundant evidence that much of the Puritan preaching of that age was like "sounding brass and a clanging cymbal"; that creed counted for more than character and doctrine than life; that, as Milton said, "the hungry sheep looked up and were not fed."

In 1647 George Fox, a half-educated shepherd lad, of what we should call the lower-middle class, came forth with a threefold message that went straight to the heart of these falsities. (1) He declared, to use the words of J. R. Lowell, that "God is not dumb that He should speak no more"; that He speaks as clearly now, and as directly to the individual as ever He did in prophetic days; that He makes Himself known to every obedient heart. His "Word" is not the Scriptures, but the Spirit that inspired them, which has ever been present with men. (2) Further, he asserted that God has no favourites. His "Word" is with all men; He is "no respecter of persons"; He has sent into the world a "Light that lighteth every man." (3) And the only condition of receiving this light is obedience—openness of heart, sincerity of soul, and a resolute will to follow. Hence a deep and penetrating reality underlay his thought of religion. "Religion, he saw, must go to the roots of being or it is no religion at all."*

How did Fox come to this? The answer must be sought in his own experience, which he has left us in the opening pages of his journal. It is deeply instructive to compare this record with that which his contemporary, Bunyan, wrote of himself in "Grace Abounding." In Fox's case there is no lamenting his past sins, no panic-stricken longing for escape from wrath. What troubles him is the sense that God is far off, that he cannot hear His voice, that he can find no one to "speak to his condition." He describes how he wandered in misery from place to place, how one religious teacher after another tried to help him, but in vain; until at last "I heard a voice which said, 'There is one, even Jesus Christ, which can speak to thy condition'; and when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy." He describes how "openings" followed—thoughts and convictions that seized his mind and held it with strange force, and moulded all his subsequent life. And he went forth now to gather men to hear his characteristic message, "That Christ is come to teach His people Himself"; that there is no need of priest or temple or ritual to bring him near.

It will be observed that Fox's faith is, like that of the first Christian disciples, of a simple and childlike character, and that theological subtleties are wholly absent from it. He identifies the mystical "Christ" of whom he speaks with the Spirit of God; the doctrine of the Trinity, in its developed form, is outside his field of thought.

Under his preaching, many came where he was; not merely into new and higher ideas of truth, but as a pre-condition to this, into a new and deeper experience of the presence and power of God in their own lives. And these were by no means all, or mainly, persons of little education. William Penn, son of an admiral, abandoned his career to become a Quaker. Isaac Pennington, oppressed with long doubts and questionings, met with some Quakers, whom, as he says, his understanding conquered, and day by day he despised them more in his heart; yet in 1658, at Bedford, he came under the power of Fox's preaching, and his life was changed. "You ask me what I have now met with. I answer, I have met with the Seed . . . . I have met with my God, I have met with my Saviour, and I have felt the healing drop from under His wings upon my spirit."

There, in those words, is the inner heart of the Quaker message. The band of young preachers, whom Fox collected chiefly from among the fells of Westmoreland, went everywhere proclaiming it; not a philosophy, not a theory, but a direct and living experience, which all might share, which each one might receive direct from God Himself. "Mystical," it may well be called, but for them it was absolute reality.

Whatever differences there might be among these Quaker evangelists, on one point they were absolutely agreed; that this light, this possibility of direct experience of God, is open to every child of man. The only theologian among them was Robert Barclay, the author of the "Apology," who called it "Universal and Saving Light." They found it in the Bible, notably in the fourth Gospel, but they did not believe it because they found it there. They believed in the light because they had entered into it and it shone upon them. They called upon men to find within themselves that which lay beneath all doctrines, and which, if obeyed, would lead them into the truth.

Observe, now, how this root experience changed their thoughts (1) of Christian life and doctrine; (2) of Church organisation; and (3) of the duty of man to man.

(1) Christian life and doctrine were never separated one from the other. Direct access to God was conditional on obedience, on self-surrender, and an opening of the soul to the light. Hence a deep sincerity and reality was essential to true religion. Worship must be "in spirit and in truth." All shams were abhorrent, all fictions impossible, all mere formalities detestable. It was because of their sense of truthfulness that they objected to judicial oaths. The nearness to God in which they lived led them to look for personal guidance in all the affairs of life, that each might be ever "in his right place." And they set no limits to the requirements of the Spirit, or the power to fulfil them, short of the command to "be perfect, even as the Father which is in heaven is perfect." It is strange to us that the very doctrine of "entire holiness," which is now preached to thousands every year at Keswick, should have been to the theologians of the day one of the most "damnable heresies" of the Quakers, and brought down on them terrible persecutions.

As regards theology, very few either of early or later Quakers have been systematic thinkers. But their root experience led them to assail many doctrines of the Church—not so much on speculative grounds as because they interfered with full realisation of the immediate presence of God, or made for unreality of life. "Imputed righteousness" was replaced by imparted righteousness; there could be no "justification" that was not at the same time sanctification. The Quakers never doubted the historical work of Christ, and, if challenged, acknowledged his death as an atonement for sin, much in the orthodox way; but they did not, in the early days at least, make this prominent in their preaching. Salvation with them was never made to depend on acceptance of this or any other doctrine, but on yielding to the present rule of Christ in the heart.

If we are compelled to classify them, I should say that the paramount place they gave to experience of Christ in the heart as the Saviour from sin makes their position fundamentally evangelical rather than Unitarian. It was certainly mystical, and perhaps the phrase "evangelical mysticism," used by Dr. Alexander Maclaren, best describes it. But many of them lived in a spiritual region where these labels have little meaning.

As regards the Bible, they insisted that inspiration was not of the past alone. It was only as we shared it that the Scriptures could have real meaning to us. But the Bible was not undervalued, as the record of man's experience of God, and of His dealing with men. They studied it deeply, and often used it to the consternation of the Bible worshippers of their day. Penn says of Fox:—

"He had an extraordinary gift of opening the Scriptures. He would go to the marrow of things, and show the mind, harmony, and fulfilling of them with much plainness, and to great comfort and edification."

I need hardly press the importance of this view of the Bible, in the presence of modern Biblical criticism. For the true Quaker criticism has no terrors, as it has for the Protestant who makes the Bible his final test of truth.

But what was the "final test of truth" for the Quakers? Did they, as thoughtful critics have all along objected, try to find it in the insight of the individual? And if so, did they make the individual infallible? This difficulty they never, so far as I can discover, adequately cleared up. I must not stay to discuss it, except to say that their ground of authority was, in effect, the testimony of the Spirit all down the ages, or, in other words, the unity of the Christian consciousness.

(2) Church Organisation.—As the direct and living influence of the Spirit was trusted for everything in the early Church, so Fox was prepared to trust it in his day. On it he rested his whole church polity. A mediating priesthood, of course, he absolutely rejected; but he threw overboard also a professional ministry. This revolutionised public worship; but he claimed that it was but a reversion to the practice of the early Church at Corinth. The "Children of the Light" whom he gathered began their meetings with silent waiting on God, as giving freedom for an "anointed" (or inspired) ministry, in which women might have a part equally with men.

This practice has continued for 250 years, and is perhaps the most distinctive feature of Quaker life. The ideal is a lofty one, and I do not wish to hide the difficulty of living up to it. Many of those who have tried it will agree that it is the highest form of worship they have known, so long as the consciousness of the Spirit is vividly felt by the worshippers; but if this dies down and becomes enfeebled, blankness or futility is likely to be the issue.

All forms and ceremonies being needless, the so-called Sacraments were rejected with the rest. The Quakers felt that with Jesus, even more than with prophets and apostles, the inner or spiritual significance was everything, and that he could not really have intended to establish binding ceremonies. The passages in the Gospels where he seems to do so, they explained away; and, curiously, these are among the first passages whose genuineness modern textual criticism has called in question. It would be a mistake to suppose that the protest against sacraments was a mere negation. It was because the Quakers knew the reality without the symbol that they called to men to drop the latter as a needless encumbrance. Their experience illustrates this broad fact of religious history—that elaborate ecclesiastical arrangements grow up just as consciousness of the Spirit dies away, and that, when this is recovered, organisation can be reduced to a minimum.

(3) The Duty of Man to Man.—The fundamental thought of the dignity of man, in virtue of the light (or "seed") of God within him, carried with it, of necessity, the thought of the ideal worth of all men. Hence the re-discovery of individualism meant also the discovery of what is truest in socialism. The Quakers were in no sense communists; but they were steady believers in the worth of man as man, and in the equality of all men in the sight of God. Oppression and injustice they learned to loathe. It was no accident that associated philanthropy with their creed.

Very soon after the beginning of his ministry, George Fox records how he went to the justices at Mansfield, who (in accordance with Elizabeth's "Statute of Apprentices") were in session to fix the rate of wages in their district, to plead with them "not to oppress the servants in their wages, but to do that which was right and just to them." He also "exhorted the servants to do their duty and to serve honestly." In Cornwall he describes the measures he took to check the inhuman practice of wrecking; and tells how, in the West Indies, he pleaded with the slave-owners to use their blacks with tenderness, and even, after some years of servitude, to set them free. He does not seem to have perceived that slavery was necessarily wrong in itself; but his companion in the island of Barbadoes, William Edmundson, in 1675 did take this position, and was promptly arrested by the Governor on a charge of inciting the negroes to rebel. And the Society of Friends has the honour of having been the first religious body in America to take the ground that slaveholding was inconsistent with membership.

The sufferings of the early Quakers in the loathsome prisons of the seventeenth century awoke them to the need of prison reform. Fox writes:—"I laid before the judges what a hurtful thing it was that prisoners should lie so long in jail; showing how they learned wickedness of one another, in talking of their bad deeds." But it was not till Elizabeth Fry stirred the conscience of the public, early in the last century, that any lasting reforms were effected.

It was the same sense of the worth of manhood, the same fervent belief in the inclusiveness of the law of love, that led to the protest against war which the Friends have always maintained. Fox records how, in 1651, just before the battle of Worcester, some people offered to make him a captain in the Parliamentary army. "But," he says, "I told them that I lived in the virtue of that life and power which took away the occasion of all wars." It will be observed that his foundation is a very deep one. It is the spirit that leads men into war that he is free from, and out of which he calls others. He saw, as his followers have with more or less consistency maintained, that the true defences of a nation are not material but moral—are to be found in justice and love, in freedom and contentment, in right dealing between man and man.

Now, in conclusion, is the mission of the Quakers ended? Has the world fully learned the lesson they were commissioned to teach? In point of numbers his followers have long been but a feeble folk; but it is striking to observe that the doctrines proclaimed by nearly every religious body now are indefinitely nearer to those of George Fox than to those of his Puritan persecutors.

And yet there are surely tendencies of the days in which we live that demand his message of reality as much as ever.

On the one hand we see a growing disbelief in religion. New discoveries have upset ancient systems, and the idea prevails in many minds that Christianity is played out. There is room for those, whether they call themselves or not by the name of Quakers, who can live Christianity rather than talk about it; who can show in their own lives that it is a real experience, able to transform character, to inspire with worthy ideals, to supply the moral dynamic that is needed to live them out; transfiguring suffering into discipline and drudgery into blessedness, and "changing," as has been finely said, "the thou shalt of the tables of stone into the I will of a new nature."

On another hand we see a growing ecclesiasticism; we see an infallible church hailed by many as a refuge from the anguish of doubt—but threatening to destroy our religious liberty and fetter us to a priesthood. There is room for those who can prove that the Spirit is free from human organisation, and works in all alike, layman as well as priest, woman as well as man, if only they will obey; that the Christian life may be an intense reality without any priesthood or any sacraments, or any machinery whatever. There is room for those who can trust the Spirit to direct and control their corporate life.

Lastly, there is a growing materialism of life—the decay of political ideals—the tendency to worship force and wealth and prosperity, to bow down to all that is big and strong and impressive to the outward eyes. There is room for those who stand for the reality of the Unseen, who dare to act on the conviction that it is not material but moral forces that really mould the destinies of men, who are willing to trust the hidden and silent influences of justice and of love. There is room for those who can be patient, because they "have faith in God." As William Watson sings:—

"The sovereign forces that conspire to bring Light out of darkness, out of winter spring,
Perform, unseen, their tasks benign and fair.
The sower soweth seed o'er vale and hill,
And long the folded life waits to be born;
Yet hath it never slept, nor once been still,
But clouds and suns have served it night and morn;
The winds are of its secret counsels sworn,
And time and nurturing silence work its will."

MR. C. E. MAURICE ON CONSCRIPTION.

AT the afternoon conference at College Chapel, Stepney Green, on Sunday, Dec. 3, the subject of Conscription was introduced by Mr. Maurice. Conscription, he said, was an evil because it infringed the liberty of the subject, preventing a man from moving freely from place to place and hampering him in choice of occupation; it also infringed liberty of conscience, and placed in a most awkward and perplexing position those who have scruples about transgressing the simple command not to kill. Barrack life was not only injurious to morality, but to industry and commerce, it was a hindrance to the pursuit of skilled labour and to the attainment of excellence in the ordinary trades and professions. He also pointed out that Germany, to whose thought and genius we owe so much in the past, has deteriorated by Conscription crushing out internal liberty, and that, owing to this, the great ideal of German unity advocated by Stein and Arndt in 1813, and again in 1848 under the influence of Blum and Hecker, is now repelling those who would most have welcomed it. Though Conscription has never been tried in England in the army, the use of forced service in the navy by means of the press gang in the last century met with great opposition and resistance, in spite of the war against Napoleon, which was most popular. Finally, Mr. Maurice said that the fact of forcing military instruction on the nation would tend to create the war spirit, and would be provocative of increasing offensive and defensive warfare. "Therefore," he concluded, "I should earnestly appeal to my hearers to resist the introduction of a law so dangerous to liberty and morality, so contrary to all the best English traditions, so likely to lead to disaster and failure."

In the evening Mr. Maurice occupied the pulpit, and gave an address on Peace. In impressive and earnest words he set forth the moral and religious principles which underlie it. He first showed that war and aggression of every kind are largely due to lack of imagination and lack of sympathy, which hinder us from understanding the ideals, the aspirations, and the needs of others, and also on account of still greater moral defects—greed and love of pleasure. He pointed out that the very qualities which we admire in the soldier—courage, self-sacrifice, &c.—are virtues which are really better developed in times of peace. He instanced the endurance and heroism of the Russian Doukhobors, in Canada, who had sacrificed so much in order to keep true to their conscience, not to enter into military service, and not to trangress the law "Thou shalt not kill."

Mr. Maurice concluded by saying, "As peace is secured, the chances of noble and interesting life become more and more possible; not merely the openings for better expenditure of money, when armaments no longer need support—but the opening for every kind of thought and industry, which is checked and thrown into the background by war. There is hardly any question of the day which is not touched by the proposal to cultivate peace for war. As our relations with the foreigner are made more reasonable and friendly, new exchanges of thought and hopes and information become possible to us. For, after all, peace is not the mere removal of war. It is the state in which men and women understand each other best, work together most heartily, find most subjects of sympathy with each other, and, by restraining the baser part, gain greater opportunity of growing to higher life—'to the measure of the fulness of the stature of Christ.'"

CORRESPONDENCE.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—My letter criticising the doings and policy of the S.U.A. has brought to light, by your courtesy, the report which otherwise would not have been published. My criticism was from memory of it as read at the annual meeting; now that I have carefully studied it I cannot otherwise describe it than as an indictment against the McQuaker trustees. The adjectives I used to qualify the "indictment" are justified by the report itself. That it is other than "deliberate" the secretary would be the first to deny; that it is "elaborate" is shown by the fact that the criticism of the trustees occupies sixteen out of its nineteen paragraphs; and that it is "severe" is proved by such phrases as "your representatives were grievously astonished and disturbed" by the "ill-devised London proposal"; "mere trifling with a serious matter by a body who claimed to be discharging a sacred trust in Scotland." The whole tone of the report, in spite of a show of respect, is depreciatory and even contemptuous of the purpose and procedure of the trustees. An unfavourable comparison of the designs and deeds of the trustees with those of the Association runs th ough the report. Credit is taken to the Association for arousing and converting the trustees to the adoption "for the first time of other methods denoting either a new aspect or a new policy." The bravado is ridiculous in presence of the substantial work accomplished by the trustees.

Mr. Davidson accuses me of "misrepresentation of facts": what fact have I misrepresented? He has not dealt with any of the facts which I stated. By implication he would have it believed that my representation of the report as an "indictment" is false, but I maintain its veracity.

The report makes manifest the neglect of which, in the interest of our churches as a whole, I complained. It contains no reference to our congregations in Edinburgh, Dundee, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. The secretary does not offer any apology for the neglect. If, as he avers, churches are still recognised in the Constitution, they are but scantily acknowledged in the report. His silence regarding the introduction of unusual church reports and the exclusion of usual ministerial reports substantiates my idea that the Association has left the old lines.

He makes no attempt to defend the deliberate scorn of the efforts of the Aberdeen congregation to house and advance itself properly. His silence here is an admission that the story of it is too shameful to be faced; and I do not seek to humiliate those concerned by compelling them to face it publicly.

Mr. Davidson endeavours to refute my suggestion of the illegality of the new Constitution, but he fails utterly. My contention is that, from its inception in 1808 (why does Mr. Davidson begin at 1861?) the Scottish Unitarian Fund or Association represented a federation of churches. This is expressly set forth in the statement of "the fundamental principles":—(1) "To support the public worship of God by giving assistance, as far as possible, to such societies of Unitarian Christians as may require it." The rules, as extended in 1813 (2) show "That the subjects are (1) 'To promote and keep up an intercourse and correspondence betwen the different societies in Scotland united upon the common principles of the strict unity of God and of his universal love to his creatures; (2) To support public worship, &c.'"

From that date till 1905, with some breaks, the Association continued to give assistance to churches as its main object. Mr. Davidson misrepresents the objects of the Association when he says "the main object was not to strengthen the Unitarian societies, &c." Under the heading "Objects of the Associations," in the document to which he refers, it is expressly declared that the first object is "To preserve and strengthen the Unitarian societies already existing in Scotland." Mr. Davidson asserts that "the whole sense and essence of the actually stated purpose of the Constitution of 1861 has been altogether transferred to that of 1905." I deny it. The main purpose of the Association in 1861 was not to "seek out those who hold Unitarian principles without having enjoyed the opportunity of joining a Unitarian congregation." That was subordinate, and implied the existence of Unitarian congregations, preserved and strengthened. The new Constitution puts uppermost what has all along been undermost. "Grants to churches" are crossed out from it: they now form no part of the duty or policy of the Association. It no longer exists avowedly to "preserve and strengthen" churches. I venture to think the change is illegal. The money now possessed by the Association is the remains o the sum got by the sale of the Kilbarchan Church. I hold that money so procured is earmarked for church purposes. I am aware that churches have "the right of representation on the committee of the Association" under the new Constitution; but what avails such representation if the Association makes no endeavour to preserve and strengthen churches, as has been the experience of the Aberdeen Church in its recent procedure?

Further, the Association still seeks to work in connection with the McQuaker trustees, who are bound to assist churches: how can it now act in line with it?

An example of the policy of the Association in this regard is given in its action over Kirkcaldy. I understand that the McQuaker trustees have promised a grant of £150 to the Kirkcaldy congregation for three years, and I gathered from the fervid talk of the representatives of the Association at the Conference here that the Association would also give something toward the salary of an efficient minister; but I am informed that the Association has done nothing, and the salary offered as an inducement is £150. I regard that as shameful.

My reference to an "unwarranted decision" of the Committee of the Association to sell the Kilmarnock Church was justified by the fact that no such warrant had been given by the members of the Association. I was not present when the vote was taken on the Kilmarnock Church, but I have reason to believe that the members as a whole do not approve of the proposal to sell the church. It ought not to be done till all other means are exhausted. Further, I hold the decision to sell was "unwarranted" because the Association made no special appeal to its members for a Kilmarnock fund. If they had, they surely would have got a guarantee of £50 for three years. That would save the situation.

Those who know of my thirty-five years' connection with the Association will acquit me of a desire to cast "unwarranted aspersions" upon it, and even Mr. Davidson might credit me with the wish to see the Association keep fidelity and work efficiently for the Unitarian cause.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Bell-street Mission.—The Rev. Sydney H. Street writes from 4, Avenue-villas, Cricklewood-lane, N.W.:—"The time has once again come round when I must ask you to be good enough to insert an appeal on our behalf. Christmas time is one of the few bright spots in the dull round of life for many of our neighbours, and we want to make it as bright as we can for as many as we can. In this effort we have always to depend upon the help that comes to us from generous friends. Our Poor's Purse, too, has practically to rely upon the donations which come at Christmas time for its year's income, and unhappily the demands upon it are always greater than its capacity."

Bedfield.—The Rev. Wm. Birks, of Diss, lectured to the Men's Club and Institute on Monday evening the 11th inst., on "The Worlds Around Us," illustrated with lantern pictures. There was a very large and appreciative audience,' consisting chiefly of young men from four villages. Mr. Newell has been giving lantern lectures on various topics in Bedfield and the adjoining villages, this by Mr. Birks making the seventh since the dark evenings commenced.

Blackpool: North Shore.—A sale of work was held on Dec. 6, opened by Mrs. J. R. G. Grundy, of South Shore, in the presence of a large number of persons, representing different denominations. The net proceeds amounted to £45.

Coventry.—A successful sale of work in connection with the Great Meeting was held on Saturday, Dec. 9. It was opened by Miss Plant, Mr. F. E. Armstrong being in the chair.

Derby.—On Sunday, Nov. 26, the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold preached at Friar-gate Chapel.

Dukinfield (Farewell Presentation).—We reported last week the farewell presentation to the Rev. H. S. Tayler, at the Old Chapel School. On Tuesday evening, December 5, the annual Congregational tea-party was held, when presentations were made on behalf of the congregation. There was a very large gathering, over which Alderman J. Kerfoot, J.P., presided, a number of neighbouring ministers being among those present. The Rev. A. R. Andreæ read a letter from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, in which he spoke very warmly of Mr. Tayler's long ministry at the Old Chapel, and also of his wife, who had been there all her life, and the great regret they all felt at losing them. The chairman also expressed the gratitude of the congregation to Mr. Tayler, and Miss Armitage, on their behalf, presented to Mr. Tayler a gold lever watch, suitably inscribed. Mrs. Buckley followed with the presentation of a gold chain, to Mrs. Tayler and the two children also received gifts from the congregation. In acknowledging the gifts, Mr. Tayler spoke very gratefully of the sympathy and affection with which the congregation had always sustained him in his work, and of the close ties which would always bind him and Mrs. Tayler to the Old Chapel. He rejoiced in the way in which the young people were coming forward to take their part in the life of the congregation, and prophesied for it a prosperous future.

Gloucester.—A very successful sale of work was held in the schoolroom of Barton-street Chapel on the 7th inst. The sale was opened by Mrs. Price, of Pen Moel, who made a very telling and encouraging speech. Mr. C. Washbourne presided, and was supported by Rev. J. McDowell, president of the Western Union, the Rev. Walter Lloyd, and other friends. An excellent concert was given during the evening, and notwithstanding several other sales or bazaars in progress at the same time, the attendance was most encouraging. The object was to clear off a balance of £30 on repairs and improvements recently carried out at a cost of nearly £150. The sum required was practically obtained.

Hull.—A Social Service Committee has been formed in connection with the Park-street Church, with the Rev. F. H. Vaughan as chairman, and Mr. T. Holmes as secretary. The first piece of work initiated has been a "Pleasant Monday Evening for Women," which, after a thorough visitation of the neighbourhood for the giving of invitations, was inaugurated by a most successful meeting. The church was packed with women, and the service was on P.S.A. lines, simple and direct. Mrs. Vaughan presided, and Mrs. Lummis, late president of a similar society at Leicester, also gave an address. There was plenty of music, and the evening was evidently greatly enjoyed.

Leigh.—On Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave one of his popular recitals to the members and friends of the Unitarian Guild. The evening, needless to say, was greatly enjoyed.

London: Essex Church.—On Tuesday next, at 8.30, in continuation of the course on "Cities of Italy," Mr. H. B. Lawford will deliver a lantern lecture on "Venice and Verona." On Sunday evening next, at 6.30, selections from "The Messiah" will be rendered by an augmented choir.

London: Forest Gate.—A successful sale of work was held at Upton-lane last week, opened by Mr. John Harrison. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards also spoke a few kind words. About £70 will be available to liquidate the current deficiency, leaving a small balance on the right side.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached at Rosslyn-hill Chapel last Sunday evening, and there was a very large congregation. The Rev. Henry Gow conducted the service. At morning service the "New Hymnal," which has been adopted by the congregation, was used for the first time. To-morrow (Sunday) evening Mr. Brooke is to preach on "War," and on the 24th on "Peace."

Lye.—The congregation are preparing to celebrate their centenary on January 5, and have a scheme for alterations and repairs of the present chapel (built in 1861), schools, and parsonage at a cost of £200. Of this, over £100 is already promised. The original chapel was opened January 5, 1806, by the Rev. James Scott, of Cradley. On the centenary day, which is a Friday, the Rev. Joseph Wood is to preach, and on the following Sunday also there will be special services.

London: Mansford-street.—The meeting in celebration of the opening of the new club rooms, held on Thursday, December 7, was unique in character. About 150 men from the neighbourhood assembled in the large hall. There were evident signs that many of them had come in direct from their daily toil. There was no restriction against burning "the fragrant weed," and consequently they felt at home from the outset. They listened with close attention to the various speeches, and were quick to appreciate the points. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill, Parliamentary candidate for S.W. Bethnal Green, was in the chair, and made an effective speech on the value of association. Rev. John Ellis followed and emphasised the note of brotherhood which should find expression in real fellowship and social service. Mr. James Branch, L.C.C., Parliamentary candidate for Enfield, pleaded with the younger men to acknowledge the importance of intellectual pursuits, and commended the idea of P.S.A. or Fellowship meetings on Sunday. The Rev. Gordon Cooper took advantage of the occasion to announce the various agencies, religious, social, and philanthropic, connected with the Mission, the advantages of which were open to members of the club. And Mr. J. Classon Drummond made a genial and forcible speech on the motives which led to the inauguration of the Mansford-street Working Men's Club and the broad basis of its membership. After the speech-making the men adjourned to the new club rooms for friendly chat and to watch games of billiards. The names of 20 additional members were enrolled.

London Sunday School Society.—A very successful social meeting of the teachers and elder scholars was held on Saturday evening, Dec. 9, at Essex Hall. There must have been about 300 present, and a capital programme of music, song and recitation was given. The president, Mr. Alec Barnes, was in the chair, and gave a brief address.

Pentre.—On Saturday, Dec. 2, the Rev. G. Critchley gave a lecture on Lowell, which was greatly appreciated.

Pepperhill.—A successful sale of work and concert was held at Pepperhill on Saturday last. Rev. John Ellis was in the chair, and Mrs. Empsall, of Bradford, formally opened the proceedings. Numerous friends from Bradford attended. A vote of thanks to Mrs. Empsall was moved by Mrs. Ellis, and seconded by Mr. G. E. Verity. About £20 was added to the Renovation Fund as a result of the effort.

Preston.—On Saturday, Sunday, and Monday last a series of meetings was held in connection with the opening of the new Sunday-school buildings and vestry. As a result of efforts during the last fifteen months, a new block of buildings has been erected over part of the old graveyard, comprising a large vestry, classroom, lavatories, cloak room, and church parlour on the ground floor, and a hall capable of seating about 350 people on the first floor. The total cost will be about £1,000, towards which £469 is in hand. The buildings were declared open on Saturday afternoon by Mr. Alderman Bowring, of Liverpool. The Rev. Charles Travers took the chair, and was supported by the Rev. Jas. Harwood, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and a number of prominent laymen of the district. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Bowring, and further speeches were made by Mr. John Healey, J.P., Mr. A. Winstanley, Mr. A. Crompton, Mr. W. Haslam, and the Revs. J. Harwood and T. P. Spedding. Tea was afterwards served to the audience, which nearly filled the school. On Sunday the Rev. Jas. Harwood preached to congregations that filled the chapel on each occasion, and the Rev. Charles Travers addressed a large gathering in the schoolroom in the afternoon. On Monday evening a most successful reunion of old and present members was held. About 200 sat down to tea, The Rev. Charles Travers took the chair, and ventured to express the belief that they were starting upon a new era in the cause of Unitarianism in Preston. A resolution of warmest thanks was passed to the Rev. J. Harwood for his services, and to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for its encouragement and help. A concert and dance followed. During the whole of the meetings a sum of nearly £50 was received.

Ringwood (Appointment).—Mr. Chas. E. Reed, of Horwich, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of St. Thomas' Chapel for a year and will enter on his ministry on the first Sunday of the New Year.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, Dec 3, a special afternoon service was held in the General Baptist Chapel, when Mr. Frederick Low, K.C., great grandson of the Rev. Stephen Philpot, minister of the Chapel, 1791—1821, attended and unveiled a new tomb-stone in the burial ground to the memory of the Philpot-Low family. The opportunity was also taken to unveil a memorial brass to a son of the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, who died in 1883, aged seventeen. The brass had been sent as a gift from America to Mr. Brinkworth. An interesting historical address on the origin of the congregation and the connection of the Philpot-Low families with it, was given by Mr Brinkworth.

Stannington (Appointment).—The Rev. James Ruddle, of Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Manchester, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the trustees and congregation to become minister of the Underbank Chapel, and will enter upon his duties at the beginning of March.

THE sainted dead shall finish for us the blessed work which they began. They tarried with us and nurtured a human love; they depart from us and kindle a divine.—James Martineau.

GOD AND THE SOUL: An Essay towards Fundamental Religion.

By RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.

Concerning Mr. Armstrong's book, the late Dr. Martineau wrote: "Looking at the book simply as a Truth seeker, I am convinced that it assumes nothing which the Agnostic can disturb, infers nothing which its premisses do not involve, and gathers into its results all the contents of Christian aspiration and experience."

THE FIRST THREE GOSPELS: Their Origin and Relations.

Third Edition. With a New Chapter on the Historical Value of the Gospels.

By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A.

In reviewing the first edition of Mr. Carpenter's book in the Nineteenth Century, Mrs. Humphry Ward wrote: "It is certainly no ordinary text-book, and the public at large would do well to read it and ponder some of the problems it suggests. . . . Nothing could be more interesting."

THE SOUL: Its Sorrows and its Aspirations.

By FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN.

With Memoir and Introduction by CHARLES B. UPTON, B.A., B.Sc.

CONTENTS:—Memoir and Introduction. Preface to First and Third Editions. I. Sense of the Infinite without us. II. Sense of Sin. III. Sense of Personal Relation to God. IV. Spiritual Progress. V. Hopes concerning Future Life. VI. Prospects of Christianity.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

HEARTIEST good wishes for this Christmas season to all friends near and distant!

THE volume of the Memoir and Sermons of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, is at the binders, but only a few copies, if any, are likely to be ready this week.

THE Annual Letter of the Committee of the Sunday-school Association has been issued by Mr. Ion Pritchard, the hon. secretary, to all the schools in the Essex Hall Year-book. Among its announcements is one that the Rev. Charles Roper has undertaken to edit next year's Monthly Notes for Teachers. The admirable address given by Miss Punnett at the last annual meeting on "How to make our Lessons interesting," has been issued in a condensed form. A new edition of the Code Book is to be issued early in the New Year, and also the Rev. Alfred Hall's biography of Dr. Martineau for young people.

THE Sunday-school Association (Essex Hall) make a special offer for a limited period of the volumes of "The Helper" for 1898, 1899, 1900, and 1902, which were published at 2s. 6d. net, at 1s. per volume, postage 4d. The volumes are of permanent value to teachers and parents. The four volumes of the "Sunday-school Helper" for 1888-91 are also offered for 6d. each, and 4d. for postage.

THE Essex Hall Pocket Almanack (1s. 3d. net), containing the "Directory of Ministers and Congregations" for 1906, is now issued. Its value is well known to our readers. The Year-book will not be out quite as early as usual in the New Year, as considerable additions are being made to the information it contains. The "Directory" is separately issued as a 3d. pamphlet.

MR. GEORGE HERRING'S gift of £100,000 affords a splendid opportunity for an effectual demonstration of what may be done towards the relief of the problem of Unemployment by home colonisation. The money is entrusted to General Booth, to be administered by the Salvation Army, and the proposal is that those who are settled on the land shall make regular repayments over a term of years, until an independent peasant proprietorship is established. Mr. Herring's gift is to go eventually, in annual instalments of £4,000 to the King's Hospital Fund.

THE beautiful group of "Jesus and the Children," which stands in the Whitworth Park in Manchester, a work in terra cotta, executed by Mr. George Tinworth from the design of Mr. R. D. Darbishire, is reproduced as the large central picture in the sheet almanack of the Sunday School Union for 1906, and in the similar almanack of the Christian Endeavour Union, which is given with the double Christmas Number (2d.) of the Christian Endeavour Times. It is a fine reproduction of the statue group, and one must rejoice that such a work should have the wide publication thus secured for it. The Sunday School Almanack can be had for 1d. from the Sunday School Union, 57, Ludgate-hill, E.C., and might well find a place on the walls of our schools and homes. Its motto is, "Do justly, love mercy, walk humbly with thy God," on either side of which is a hymn, "The wise may bring their learning," and

"Be strong!
We are not here to play, to dream, to drift,
We have hard work to do, and loads to lift."

DR. EDWARD EVERETT HALE and the other Unitarian delegates who were excluded from the Inter-Church Conference on Federation at New York have issued a letter of protest, which was read from the pulpits of all the Unitarian churches in Boston. The writers declare that, while they do not wish to rouse controversy over this action, it seems timely for them "to affirm anew the simple truth, proclaimed of old by Christ himself, that righteousness of life and spiritual efficiency rather than orthodoxy of belief is the test of Christian discipleship. We affirm that the doing of the will of the Master is the vital thing, and that beliefs about the nature of Christ are unimportant in comparison with practical obedience to his precepts."

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S new story "Fenwick's Career" which began in the November number of the Century Magazine, opened in the Lake District, but in the December number the young artist, whose career is to be followed, has come up to London, and is entering upon the experiences of the great world. His wife and little girl are left in Langdale, until he has made his way, and can send for them to follow him.

THE December Century also contains these lines, "The Answer," by Grace Ellery Channing :—

"'Proof,' asks the Soul, that that which is, shall be?
That which was not, persist eternally?
Faith fails before the mortal mystery.'

Yet more miraculous miracle were this:
The mortal, dreaming Immortality;
The finite, framing forth Infinity;
The shallow, lightly plumbing the abyss;
Ephemeral lips, creating with a kiss;
The transient eye, fixed on Eternity!"

"WE may strive to understand better the gifts, the duties, and the difficulties of other nations; and we may, if we are called to judge in our own case, learn to exercise the most severe impartiality. I often wish we could introduce into our treaties a clause which I believe William Penn introduced into his treaty with the Indians, in which the contracting parties bound themselves solemnly not to believe evil reports which were circulated about either side. We can also refrain from exercising any judgment adverse to another nation without full investigation. We must not use language which is not perfectly reconcilable with the respect due to their national dignity. And, if we are forced to become judges in our own cause, surely, then, we shall feel that the obligation is laid upon us to act in the spirit of judges to weigh the ends, the means, the rights, the principles which are involved; and, above all things, to discountenance what is so common—a vague appeal to national honour. The honour of a nation, like the strength of a nation, in the long run, is a nation's righteousness."—Bishop Westcott.

RECEPTION TO PROFESSOR SEN.

THE President and Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association gave a reception at Essex Hall on Monday evening to Professor Benoyendra Nath Sen, of the Presidency College, Calcutta.

Tea and coffee were served at eight o'clock, and there was a good and representative attendance. Later in the evening the President, Mr. C. F. Pearson, took the chair, supported by Professor Sen, the Rev. James Harwood, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

The PRESIDENT offered a very cordial welcome to Professor Sen, and referred to the visit of his famous relative, Keshub Chunder Sen, a generation ago.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD followed, and recalled the fact that when he himself went to India, nine years ago, Professor Sen was one of those, who on his arrival very early in the morning at Calcutta, welcomed him at the station. Now they welcomed Professor Sen, for the sake of the country from which he came, for the sake of the religion he represented, which in India demanded sacrifices from its adherents such as it was difficult for them to realise; and for his own sake, honouring the name he bore, and because of his own distinguished position in Calcutta. He was professor in the leading college of Bengal, and secretary of the Brahmo Samaj Committee, which represented and sought to unite all the sections of that body.

PROFESSOR SEN'S ADDRESS.

Professor SEN acknowledged the honour done to him, to the Brahmo Samaj, and to his beloved country, by that reception, and spoke of the closeness of the ties which unite the Brahmo Samaj and the Unitarian body. Mr. Sunderland's visit, which led to the formation of their joint Brahmo Samaj Committee, marked a new era in their relations, which had been confirmed by the visit of Mr. Harwood and the work of Mr. Fletcher Williams. Their work in India, he said, might be divided into two main parts, the first theological and religious, the second social and educational. Of these, Professor Sen spoke as follows:—

Religious Work.

The great religious problem that we have before us is the same all the world over; it is to bring the thought of the Eternal Father directly to the heart and soul of every individual man instead of to any particular class. In other words, the problem is how to realise the infinite freedom of the human soul. The watchword of the present day is: Trust the human heart.

The whole history of the development of the Brahmo Samaj during these seventy-five years has been just the working out of this problem. Raja Rammohun Roy, who founded the Brahmo Samaj in 1830, in bringing about the great revival, had to depend almost necessarily to a very large extent upon the ancient Scriptures of the country. He did not dispute the revelation or perhaps the infallibility of the Upanishads and the Vedanta philosophy, and in setting forth his great idea of monotheism he wanted to present it on the basis of the Upanishads.

The next great leader in the Brahmo Samaj, Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, also went back to the Upanishads to begin with. In his Autobiography he describes how he had grown up to his eighteenth year without any knowledge of God, without any ideas of religion, and how at that age, when he was taking a walk on the riverside, he listened to a certain hymn tune that came into his ears, and felt as he had never felt before. Then he describes how for months together his heart was desolate and there was no peace in his soul, though he was living in the midst of princely luxuries. Then a certain stray leaf from one of the Upanishads fell into his hands, and the passage upon it was: "The whole Universe is clothed with the Spirit of God." He says that when he came across that passage he found at once a response therein to all that his heart had been hankering after. And that brought him to the Brahmo Samaj. But, curiously enough, though it was the Upanishads which brought him into the Brahmo Samaj, the great question before him was, Could he accept the Upanishads exactly in the light in which they were accepted by the orthodox Hindus, and in order to satisfy himself upon that he sent four scholars to Benares in order to study the Vedas and the Vedanta philosophy. When they came back it was found that there were things even in the Upanishads which it was impossible to accept as verbally infallible, so the verbal infallibility of the Scriptures was boldly given up, and the basis of the religion of the Brahmo Samaj became the direct, immediate consciousness of God within every individual human soul, not dependent upon Scriptures, but upon the native, pure instincts of the human heart.

If man by nature is the child of God, why should we be so afraid? Where canst thou wander away from the house of thy Father? The human heart bears upon it the stamp of that one Universal Father, and at the close of all your wanderings and errors you will at last come before His Throne. That was the position of the Brahmo Samaj.

When Keshub Chunder Sen came, the main idea that he brought into the Brahmo Samaj was the idea of a divine dispensation. He recognised that in all these workings of the Spirit in the history of our country, there were indications of the finger of an over-ruling Providence, and that Providence is working everywhere in the world. In all this great social and spiritual upheaval we recognise that it is the Spirit of God that is leading forth man to a higher form of life, to a higher and deeper union with His own Spirit.

Then combined with that idea there was another. In India we have all the great world religions side by side. To us Buddhism is not merely a name, though there are no Buddhist sects at present in India. When we see the great temples we feel as if the breath from the past comes to us and speaks of that great sage and teacher.

We have Mahommedanism there. Hinduism is the religion of more than two hundred millions of people. And we have Christianity also, in a living form. Consequently the question naturally occurs to the Indian Theist, What is the relation between these great world religions? The answer that Keshub Chunder Sen gave out of the instincts of his heart was that these great religions, and the great prophets from whom they came, must be all ways of God to the same Father, and in their history there must be the evolution of the same Spirit working in different ways under different conditions and circumstances. The problem in India is, how to recognise that harmony, not only by means of intellectual speculation, but by means of spiritual culture in character, in life, in church organisation. To us, Jesus should not only be some name that has come down from the Past, but a living spirit. To us, Buddha must be someone whose spirit we can recognise and assimilate into our own character and life in the present. The spirit of Mahomet, the spirit of all the great prophets and saints of the world, must be to us a living fact. And by means of spiritual assimilation we have to make them all our own. And when we bring together into focus the spirit which Raja Rammohun Roy, the spirit which Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, and the spirit which Keshub Chunder Sen brought into the Brahmo Samaj, then we shall have the theology we want. We have not yet got it. How properly to enter into the spirit of all the great prophets and saints of the world—that is the problem before us. We must first realise what Jesus is to us, what Buddha is to us, and then it will be time to form a definite constructive theology which will set forth in scientific terms and in logical order the ideas, thoughts, and sentiments that we have in our minds. So the theology of the Brahmo Samaj is still to come.

Social and Educational Work.

Coming now to our social and educational work, there is a great deal in this department that is done simply by English education, breaking down the barriers that the caste system set up between one section and another of the Hindu people, and giving education and greater freedom to women. These are questions that are to a large extent spontaneously solved by the introduction of the spirit of Western education.

The Brahmo Samaj has a very heavy responsibility with regard to these questions, and that responsibility lies in transfiguring, as it were, the work that is being spontaneously done by the spirit of Western education, and imparting to it that sanctity, that consecration which comes alone from the spirit of religion. It is the responsibility of the Brahmo Samaj to see that the high ideal of womanhood as it existed in India, and as it has come to us from the West, should be strictly maintained. Another question which we have to take up is the temperance movement, and how to place before our people refined forms of enjoyment and entertainment, so that the evil of drink may have no temptation for them.

Then there is the great question of religious education. There is English education in the country, but from the lowest schools to the highest Universities this education means simply fitting the people for some employment in Government service, or for becoming doctors and lawyers and clerks in mercantile offices. There was a time when we had our indigenous institutions in Hinduism as well as in Mahommedanism for putting religious ideas into the minds of the people, but those have been almost imperceptibly dying out, and there is nothing to take their place. We have this purely secular education, and that not of a very high order—not a secular education that really wants to train up citizens.

Now, who is to undertake the great work of making education a reality, of putting a new spirit into education so that it may mean the real training of the soul, and put higher ideas into the mind? The Brahmo Samaj has to do that. The Brahmo Samaj has to think of giving this instruction to the little children, and then going higher up. It must establish institutions for developing theology and inculcating religious ideas as well as religious enthusiasm.

There is another thing. We believe that it is necessary that we should realise fully the significance of the lessons of Christianity and the high spirit of Christendom. We believe that it is not for nothing that the East and the West were brought together. Whatever we may think of the conquests, the bloodsheds, the oppressions in many cases that may have accompanied this process, we believe that through all these things it is the spirit of Providence that has been working.

What is the best thing that we can learn from the West? The true spirit of Christendom! Speak of Jesus. Speak of the spirit of Jesus. He is not a distant personality. He is not one who has gone out of this world, but we believe that he lives in the heart and lives of Christian men and women.

It has been a blessed experience to feel how you have foregone your position, your rank, and have placed yourselves almost at the service of one coming from the East. What claims I had I do not know, but everywhere I have been amongst those who have been almost more than brothers and sisters to me. I feel that the spirit of Jesus has not gone out of the world, and I ask myself, Why should India feel this? Why should Christianity to the people of India and the people of the East mean only the spirit of conquest, only the spirit of foreign domination?

And the spirit of Jesus means not only the spirit of loving, brotherly service, but also the sense of individual responsibility, the sense of manhood, the sense of active work, the spirit of organisation, the spirit of social and political development. And our people, who have been for centuries under the influence of the idea of fatalism, want that very badly. There have been softnesses enough in Indian society; what we require is the spirit of manhood, of individual responsibility, and where, if not from the West, is this spirit to come to us?

The Brahmo Samaj must do that work, and shall we not here especially claim the sympathy and co-operation of those in the West who feel that the Brahmo Samaj is not really a different fold from theirs. We believe that in the future this co-operation will become still more a reality, and that if we require institutions, methods and organisations in the future, help will not be wanting.

And may I not tell you that help in this case will bring its reward. It is never possible for a human soul, a human organisation, to stretch out the hand of fellowship and co-operation to another soul or another society without reaping a reward a hundredfold. The more you love, the more you give, the richer are the spiritual experiences that you have, the deeper does your own spirit become, the closer does your own spirit approach to the Spirit of God Himself! If we all work in the spirit of one liberal religion all the world over, we shall feel how blessed our lives become.

I am quite sure that the whole theistic movement in the West will become indescribably richer in spiritual experiences if only this connection between India and the West grows deeper and closer. And do I not get an assurance from an assembly like this that it is not as the result of any human appeal, but as the result of the working of the Spirit of God Himself that the spirits in the West will be drawn to us, the kindred spirits in the East, and out of that union we shall have that glorious future in which the ideal of our religion will be the ideal religion of the whole world.

May I, in conclusion, again convey to you my most grateful thanks in the name of the Brahmo Samaj and in the name of India.

At the conclusion of Professor Sen's address, a vote of thanks, moved by Dr. Blake Odgers and seconded by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, was very cordially passed, and a vote of thanks to the President brought the meeting to a close.

"MEN test Christianity by its capacity for grappling with the great social questions of the age. It claims to be a force with spiritual power to renovate the world, and it can only justify the claim by confronting and overthrowing the great evils which from time to time seem to dominate the earth. The church exists to promote the Kingdom of God, and we have, therefore, every right to claim its help. If we can make the cause of peace triumph in the church, the church can make it triumph in the world. An aroused Christian conscience means an enlightened foreign policy. The church of Christ, which in the early centuries openly denounced war, and in the middle ages acted often as a peace-maker, has for over three centuries spoken with an uncertain and hesitating voice. The hope expressed by John Bright, forty-five years ago, is, however, now in gradual process of fulfilment, the hope that the churches of England, awaking from their slumbers, would gird up their loins to the work of peace. To stimulate this awakening and quicken this activity are tasks that need our vigilant effort."—W. C. Braithwaite in "Present Day Papers," June, 1899.

MAY God give us all to enter into the beautiful communion of the Holy Spirit. Then will our own lives become more gracious and pure and strong, filled with his spirit of love and peace. And sorrow will lose its bitterness, and the unkindness of men will lose its sting; and none shall any more have power to disturb us greatly, because we shall be in touch with God.—R. A. Armstrong.

LOVE'S PRAYER.

Now for our lov'd ones
  Lover of all,
Seeking Thy blessing,
  Lowly we call;
Dear is the duty,
  Sweet is the care,
Hallow'd the burden
  God stoops to share.

Friend of the children
  Father divine,
Guard well our treasures—
  Are they not Thine?
Look on the wand'rers
  Far, far away;
Home again lead them,
  Father, we pray.

God of the aged,
  Weary, and worn,
Grant them a sunset
  Brighter than morn;
In the night shadows
  Whisper Thy peace,
Till the great Morning
  Brings them release

Parents and kindred,
  Stranger and friend,
All to Thy keeping,
  Lord, we commend;
Thy love is boundless,
  Our love is small—
Thy love help our love,
  Lover of all!

W. G. TARRANT

THE CHRISTMAS FEELING.

BY DR. S. M. CROTHERS.

THIS is part of an article which appeared originally in the Reader Magazine, and which we found in the Chicago Unity last Christmas, and have been saving up ever since.

Dr. Crothers began by speaking of two other festivals for which it was not easy to keep up the original feeling, and then went on:—

Christmas is more fortunate. It comes at just the time when people naturally feel Christmasy. A sentiment of goodwill pervades the community. About this time the natural man goes around looking for an excuse for committing some overt act of benevolence. Even when the struggle for existence has been most intense he feels that he cannot be selfish all the time. He demands a few days off from the drudgery of self-seeking. He must go out and give a little something to somebody. The most widely-separated peoples have from remote antiquity celebrated winter festivals which have had the same characteristics of cheery altruism.

Erudite persons have given erudite reasons—which are the only kind that occur to them—for this phenomenon. They have explained that these festivals were all originally intended to celebrate the winter solstice. The winter solstice they suppose to have had a particularly cheering effect upon the mind of primitive man, and to have given rise to many pleasant customs which have endured to this day.

Having read this explanation a good many times, I accepted it without question, till I read the work of another philosopher, who stoutly declares that the theory is all moonshine. He insists that a really primitive man, especially if he lived in a wooded country, instead of rejoicing over an astronomical fact, wouldn't know a solstice when he saw it.

This sounds reasonable and agrees with my own limited experience. Left to my own devices, I am sure that I should not give the solstice a single thought, especially when it occurs in winter, when one's time is occupied in getting in the wood. Even as it is, with the aid of a dictionary and an almanac, my ideas on the subject are more vague than I like to admit. I feel not the slightest emotion when I read that "about the twenty-second of December the sun enters Capricorn and its diurnal motion in declination ceases." I take the fact for what it is worth, and, leaving the sun to get out of Capricorn as best it can, I go about my own business. I should not be surprised if it turns out that the primitive man did very much the same thing.

But there is one thing about mid-winter which the most unobservant person must have noticed. About this time, at least in the northern world, it becomes very uncomfortable out of doors. Mother Nature turns the cold shoulder to us, and we are compelled to take refuge with our kind. When we feel the "churlish chiding of the winter wind" we begin to appreciate a snug house, and a roaring fire, and a group of friends, and a bit of something to eat and drink. When

"Announced by all the trumpets of the sky, Arrives the snow,"

"the housemates sit
Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed
In the tumultuous privacy of storm."

And if then one catches sight of a shivering figure outside, the first instinct is to bring him in. Independence does well enough for the summer days and nights when the sky is a sufficient roof, and the sun a sufficient fire. But the doctrine of laissez-faire breaks down at the freezing point. About the twenty-fifth of December you have a feeling that you have not done your full duty by your fellow-creature out of doors when you leave him alone. We humans need one another. If we are to survive the attacks of the frost king we must stand together.

That Christmas falls upon the time of year when people are brought to a realising sense of brotherhood is owing to a happy accident. The accident was this: At the time when it first occurred to the "Bishops and other clergy" that it would be a good thing to celebrate the birth of Christ, the exact birthday had been forgotten. It was a case in which nobody could furnish any proofs, so that the Church was left with all the three hundred and sixty-five days to choose from. Under these circumstances it followed the line of the least resistance and fixed upon the time already dedicated to good cheer.

In the mid-winter holidays the Romans had for centuries been accustomed to throw aside the stiffness of ordinary life. The distinctions of rank were disregarded, there was the singing of carols, the lighting of candles, the giving of dolls to the children, the decking of the houses with evergreens, and the inviting of friends to feasts. What more natural than to add to this festival a deeper spiritual meaning by connecting it with Christ's nativity? Afterward there was a mingling of Christmas with the pagan Yule-tide. It seems a far cry from the shepherds on the plains of Bethlehem to the warriors in the little hamlets of Scandinavia; but the human need for good-will was the same. The glowing Yule-log has its cheery associations. Around it there was great feasting and loud laughter. The children shouted over the gift of the good gods, and laughed as they heard the stories of the discomfiture of the powers of darkness. For at Yule-tide, when the hungry wolves howled loudest in the wood, it was well that the fire should burn brightest and that young and old should draw together. And it was well to make wreaths of holly and mistletoe, for on these the little sprites who love green things might alight and dwell well content in the land till the springtime. And then, too, the missionaries of the new faith told of the way the trees would blossom miraculously on the night when Christ was born. That was doubtless true also, for such wonderful things were just the things which it was pleasant and right to believe.

Milton, in his poem on the Nativity, makes all the heathen divinities troop off into the dark on the night when the Christ-child was born in Bethlehem. That was a touch of the Puritan temper which was never friendly to the wide catholicity of Christmas. The missionaries of the earlier time had a more genial tolerance. They did not insist on making such a clean sweep of what some one has called "the gentlehood of heathendom."

On Christmas day they would say: "Now good friends, for this once, let the old faith and the new meet in courtesy. Let us not ask churlish questions. Let the Yule-log burn, and the mistletoe hang on the bough and the old gifts be given. Let the half-frozen little gods of the woods come in and warm themselves. If they will take christening they may stay as long as they wish. There is room for all; the more of them the merrier. As for the fairies and elves and all 'the good people' let them come in together; they will find much in common with the saints who love little children. Whoever has good cheer in his heart, be he man or elf, Christian or Pagan, is heartily welcome. When the revels have begun the chances are that one cannot tell the difference."

And no one has been able to tell the difference. And to this day learned men debate over the origin of our Christmas customs, and cannot agree as to which is Christian and which is Pagan. And the best part of it is nobody cares. It is all so irresistibly human.

Wonderful are the transforming powers of Christmas. Even the most sour-visaged saints have yielded to its influence. There was St. Nicholas of Myra! Of all the saints of the calendar he began life most unpromisingly. He was by nature an ascetic, if there ever was one. We read that on his first day he refused the bath which the nurse had prepared for him until he should have decorously finished his devotions. After that he refused all nourishment on Wednesdays and Fridays, and rebuked the maternal attempts to induce him to break his fasts. One would have expected Nicholas to grow up to be a prig and a dyspeptic, the very last person to be the patron saint of children.

And yet, unless the historical experts are all wrong and it is a case of mistaken identity, this ascetic St. Nicholas has become none other than our round, good-natured friend, Santa Claus. After all, when we come to think about it, it is not so strange. One can't be the patron saint of children without being made over. Little by little the wrinkles are smoothed out, the tense nerves relax, and disused faculties come into play again. The eyes begin to have a frosty twinkle, and there is a quisical smile around the mouth. You may see how inevitable the process is by watching the change which takes place in some keen business man of your acquaintance who, only for a few days, plays at being Santa Claus. The improvement is so marked that you cannot help wishing that he had more time for that sort of thing.

JÖRN UHL.*

GUSTAV FRENSSEN, author of the novel "Jörn Uhl," which on its publication, three years ago, "took Germany by storm," is a native of Holstein, the son of a village carpenter, and it is of the people of that North country that he writes with so much power. Born October 19, 1863, at Barlt, a village not far from the West coast, north of the Eider, and some seventy miles north-west of Hamburg, the lad was sent to school at the neighbouring town of Husum, and afterwards secured a University training, and qualified as a clergyman of the Lutheran Church. After years of waiting he was appointed to the pastorate of Hemme, another little Holstein village, within sound of the North Sea, and there Germany discovered him. Two earlier novels of his had passed unnoticed, but when "Jörn Uhl" appeared in 1902, Frenssen "awoke one morning to find himself famous." The book was very soon translated into Dutch, and now we have a thoroughly good English version, from the Preface to which, these particulars are taken.

Frenssen did not long remain a clergyman. "These Protestant churches," he says in this book, "three hundred and fifty years after Luther's death, are still unable to tolerate a pastor who pretends to being nothing more than a simple, honest man. In these country parishes there is many a sorrowful and heavy heart, whose sorrow and heaviness, moreover, is all in vain." He himself was met by the vehement hostility of the dominant orthodox party, and he left the church, retiring to his native village, where he has since devoted himself to literature. This autumn he has published another novel, "Hilligenlei" (Holy Land), which promises to make an even greater impression than "Jörn Uhl," and certainly to waken no less vehement controversy, for into this story of the fisher folk of the Holstein coast is woven a narrative of the Life of Jesus, from the author's liberal standpoint, offered as the basis for a regeneration of the German people.

In "Jörn Uhl" we have a story of peasant life told from intimate knowledge, and with great poetic power. There is abundant tragedy in it, yet in spite of the sad and dreary things the story pictures, the author's hope is realised, and we see how "all the labour and trouble the people in it go through are not gone through in vain." The elements of a true manhood emerge, clear and strong, and the closing scenes are of strenuous, happy and peaceful life. The hero of the story, in a last word to an old friend, offers this judgment of his own experience: "Although his path led through gloom and tribulation, he was still a happy man. Because he was humble and had faith." But the faith he had was only won after long striving, and through contact with the real things of life.

Jörn Uhl was the son of a peasant farmer, with a great position in that country. His great-grandfather had entertained the King of Prussia, and lent him a large sum of money, very little of which he ever got back again; but the father, though a man of proud and overbearing nature, was dissolute and involved his estate in ruin. The elder brothers also were drunken wastrels, and the mother, who was of a very different nature, dies at the opening of the story, from neglect, in giving birth to a little girl. The boy, Jörn, was then only three years old, and he and his sister grew up, neglected and despised by the others, but under the faithful care of an old servant, who promised the mother on her death bed not to desert them. She is one of the finest characters in the book, and at more than one crisis in the young man's life, is there as a good providence to keep him from despair.

Jörn grew up a quiet, brooding youth, with a natural repulsion from the dissolute habits of his father and brothers. He had ambition as a student, but gave this up, as he saw the ruin impending over his home, and devoted himself to the work of the farm. It was the gospel of hard work which first took hold of him. Then came his years of military service, and a terrible experience, most vividly described, in the Franco-Prussian war. He was with the artillery at Gravelotte. After that, ruin broke over his father's house, the brothers were driven out and the old man struck with paralysis, but the creditors left the estate in the hands of Jörn Uhl, to work out its redemption. All this time he had been growing in strength of character, and a passion for astronomy had become a great resource in his solitary hours. But hitherto, he had not had anything to reverence. Early religious teaching had made no impression, the orthodox Christ had seemed to him quite unreal, and though he began to go to church, because all the better people did, and he wished to separate himself from the careless and dissolute, the preaching of the orthodox parson, whose life was by no means in keeping with his profession, remained simply an offence.

At this point, however, when he became master of the farm, a step of progress is also marked in his inward life. This is how Frenssen describes it, as the young man sits watching through the night, by his wretched father's unconscious form:—

"Then for the first time there came into Jörn Uhl's soul the feeling of the insufficiency of mortals' strength, the feeling of man's need, the feeling, 'Whither canst thou flee, O my soul, in thy great distress and loneliness?' And now it was a good thing for him, after all, that he had once heard of the 'Father, which is in heaven,' when he was a lad at school, else he might in that hour have been filled with fear of the dark towering forms which stood scowling round him in the night, and might perchance have worshipped them. But now, in his hour of fear and faith, he turned to those unseen, strong and blessed powers which are in the gospel. And that was a mighty step for this Jörn Uhl, who had hitherto been so self-confident, to take. For, as a wise man has rightly said, it is to the humble alone that God's grace is given. Only to those who seek earnestly and ask questions, many and serious—only to those who admire and wonder and humbly worship, do the gates open that lead to a fair, wide humanity. To the heights and depths of human life, in all their wonder and beauty, only the simple and ignorant attain" (p. 247). "Zu den Weiten und Tiefen des Menschendaseins, den wunderbaren, schönen, gelangen nur die Nichtwissenden." (Only the humble-minded, who acknowledge their own ignorance.)

One episode of youthful passion Jörn Uhl had passed through before this time and had come out unscathed. Now follows his first marriage, and we confess that we have found it difficult to harmonise the manner in which he took to himself the woman whom he made his wife, with the unfolding of his character at that point. Certainly it was very different from his later wooing towards the end of the story. For the young wife died after the first year, and left him with one child. Frenssen suggests no thought of shame or compunction for his first act of high-handed passion, and simply records that it was a happy year that followed.

From the deeper solitude into which Jörn Uhl is plunged by his young wife's death, he emerges partly through the influence of his little lad, and partly through a new parson, who came to the village church, "a simple, honest man," unconventional and with genuine human sympathies. Through his lips Frenssen clearly speaks his own mind. They had put a memorial in the church to those who fell in the war, and this led him to speak of self-sacrifice, in a quiet talk he had with Jörn Uhl.

"Serving and self-sacrifice, or helping others, or loyalty to one's fellow-men, call it what you like, that is the real, human kingship. That is true Christianity."

"I can well understand that," said Jörn Uhl. "That's a thing that looks one squarely and honestly in the face." He nodded and looked at the minister, as though he expected him to say something more about the matter.

"The Saviour," the minister went on, "has by his pure and lovely life, and by his most pathetic death, as well as by his gracious, strong, proud words, cast into humanity a great stream of thoughts and new life, words like a living flame, as he said. And now one man takes this, and the other that, one church this and another that, and each squats in a corner with the little rushlight that each of them has taken, and looks at it and lets it flare or smoke, according as they prefer smoke or flame, and says, 'That's the truth of our blessed Lord! Many add their own bit of truth or even untruth, many indeed even their own wickedness and malice to it. And in this way the real image of the Saviour becomes so petrified, so disguised, so distorted, that the real nobility of his face is no longer seen. And yet all the time it is not such a difficult thing, even for an unlearned man, to form, with the sole aid of the first gospels, a picture of Christ, wherein the great, leading features of his life and will and character stand clearly forth. As far as I can see, what he has to tell us is this: We shall have faith that God in Heaven is always ready, even in our darkest hour of need, to help us with His strong, guardian arm; with this joyous trust in our hearts we shall manfully fight against all evil, both in ourselves and around us. With this faith in God, like a strong wall behind our backs, we shall fight for what's right and good, and never doubt of the victory, first here, then hereafter. That, according to my idea, is what Christianity means. But if a man cannot come to have this trust in God—for it is not everyone that can—and yet, nevertheless can live a life of goodness and love, then let us accept him for what he is, and be content and rejoice over him" (p. 287).

The further development of the story shows Jörn Uhl liberated at last, by the destruction of his hopes for the farm, and going out to make a new career for himself. The close is delightful, and we see the man, in possession of his own soul, crowned with a new happiness. His thought on the ultimate questions of life he had expressed in an earlier talk with Wieten, the faithful old servant and friend.

"Maybe, maybe," she said sadly and thoughtfully; "but we must just go on working away till evening falls and always be as kind and loving as we can."

"Right, Wieten. That's in the New Testament."

She raised her head a little as she walked on beside him.

"What! That's in the New Testament? What does it say, then about—you know, Jörn—the secret?"

"Well, as far as I can make out, Wieten, it says we won't get behind it here. But we're to have faith that everything has an aim and an inner meaning. And afterwards, after death, we'll get on a bit further, and come behind the secret, and see things, not as they appear, but as they are."

"It's no use searching, Wieten. I think Christ Himself said that even He didn't know everything. He said it wasn't necessary for us to know it. Only we should always have faith, and keep pure and loving hearts. He was against all brooding and bitterness, and against all haughtiness and the wish to know everything, and against all hating and hardness of heart. 'Have faith,' he said, 'and be pure and merciful.'"

"Jörn Uhl" is said to be ill put together. If so, this review is like it. But enough has been said, we trust, to show that it is full of the deepest human interest. It contains much more than is here even hinted at, and it certainly is a great book

SHORT NOTICES.

Christian Belief Interpreted by Christian Experience. This volume contains the "Barrows Lectures" for 1902–03 (founded in honour of Dr. J. H. Barrows after the Chicago Parliament of Religions, which he so ably served), previous courses of which have been delivered in India by Dr. Barrows and Principal Fairbairn. The lecturer in this case is President C. Cuthbert Hall, of the Union Theological Seminary, U.S.A. The Vice-Chancellor of Bombay University gives a preliminary note. There are six lectures, dealing respectively with (1) The Nature of Religion; (2) The Christian Idea of God and its Relation to Experience; (3) The Lord Jesus Christ the Supreme Manifestation of God; (4) The Sin of Man and the Sacrifice of Christ; (5) The Ideas of Holiness and Immortality interpreted by Christian Experience; and (6) Reasons for Regarding Christianity as the Absolute Religion. The book is profoundly interesting as a comparative study of Christian theology and Hindu doctrine; but it loses by the diffuseness of style, which was, no doubt, agreeable to the leisurely Orient, but is certainly wearisome to the Western reader. Not the least noticeable point about the book is the remarkable difference in tone it shows when compared with the missionary efforts of a generation or two ago. The American lecturer evidently endeavoured to bring himself sympathetically into the mood of the speculative Hindu; and throughout he introduces comparisons and contrasts in philosophy which are fully as valuable to the home student as they are likely to be to the audiences of Calcutta and elsewhere. It is mostly a Johannine type, not a Synoptic, that is presented in this picture of Christian thought and experience; and when we come down to matters of practical life, a mournful and very significant fact is that the lecturer has to plead that Christianity is not to be judged, in the East, by the type of so-called "Christian" people who are to be met there. One feels (and probably Dr. Hall felt) that a few genuinely Christlike men and women would "convert" more than all such lectures can. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s. 6d. net.)

Essays in Revolt is the title of a small but noticeable book, by Mr. Herbert M. Thompson. It discusses "what should be taught at school," and, as may be expected, the author rebels against conventional methods alike in regard to religious instruction and the study of Latin and Greek. He is not quite just, in our opinion, to the possible value of the Bible as a basis of moral instruction; but he is not a whit too severe on the ordinary methods of using the Scriptures. He gives an interesting and suggestive sketch of a course of moral instruction actually given by himself to lads of a defective type. The value of history as part of the school curriculum is emphasised, but the author is keen against the wooden system that leaves all that is most vital out of view, and especially shuns dealing with the generations closest to our own. The battle of the classics is raging fiercely just now, and Mr. Thompson strikes in vigorously on the modern side. All we can say here is that, as often taught, Latin and Greek are a little worse than useless; as they may be and sometimes are taught, they seem to us to rank very high, indeed, in educational value. Mr. Thompson, who is nothing if not practical, submits a detailed time-table at the end of his book, which will, at any rate, repay studying by teachers, if, as is likely, it bewilders the parents. OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN AITKEN.

By the death of Mr. John Aitken, the very last link in the original trusteeship of Clerk's-lane Church, Kilmarnock has been broken. He passed away peacefully on December 16, at the age of 86. He was one of a few devoted men who, when the more ambitious members of the historic church built a new place of worship, arranged to retain the old building as a living testimony against Calvinistic dogmatism. He was an open-minded, earnest, devout man, and had in his thoughts advanced beyond the Morissonianism for which the church stood, and sought to have the church as a place for progressive theology. This action of his saved the church for freedom and gave opportunity for development. When the congregation left the E. U. Connection, he and his family were ready for the change, and he and they remained in active connection with it till regular services ceased, and his health became feeble. He was a man of the noblest type, showing in business a rare integrity, and in his religious life a sweet reasonableness. The burial service was conducted at his residence on Monday, December 19, by the Rev. Alexander Webster, of Aberdeen. A. W.

OPEN THE DOOR OF YOUR HEART.

Open the door of your heart, my lad,
To the angels of love and truth;
When the world is full of unnumbered joys,
In the beautiful dawn of youth.
Casting aside all things that mar,
Saying to wrong, "Depart!"
To the voices of hope that are calling you
Open the door of your heart.

Open the door of your heart, my lass,
To the things that shall abide;
To the holy thoughts that lift your soul
Like the stars at eventide.
All of the fadeless flowers that bloom
In the realms of song and art
Are yours, if you'll only give them room.
Open the door of your heart.

Open the door of your heart, my friend,
Heedless of class or creed,
When you hear the cry of a brother's voice,
The sob of a child in need.
To the shining heaven that o'er you bends
You need no map or chart,
But only the love the Master gave.
Open the door of your heart.

PUNISHMENT cannot instil that reverence for truth that makes it impossible for a man to be a liar; indeed, injudicious punishment rather breaks the generous courage which carries truth upon its open brow, and begets the servile spirit which seeks a temporary refuge in trickery and falsehood.—James Drummond.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHRISTMAS is the children's festival of gladness, a time of rejoicing, of peace and goodwill, for young and old alike. It is the great time for home gatherings and for all the gladness that unselfish love can bring into the world.

It is good to have such a time, which reminds us, once a year at any rate, of what is best in our life, and reminds everybody, for there is no one who ought to be shut out from the Christmas gladness.

Christmas is kept as a birthday, the birthday of Jesus, though we do not really know the day on which he was born. But all Christendom has agreed that December 25 shall be kept as the day, when we rejoice together over the coming of Jesus into the world. And just as in many homes, when there is a birthday, the house is decorated and beautiful flowers are put on the birthday table, and sometimes a wreath of flowers is made and put on the head of the birthday child, because of the gladness and love which gather about the young life, so at Christmas we decorate our homes and churches as a sign of gladness and thankfulness for the new life that was given so, full of love and tenderness, of courage and hope and a strong helpfulness, when Jesus came into the world.

And those wreaths and flowers are not all the Christmas decorations. The story of the birth of Jesus is decorated too. We read it in the Gospels, and sing of it in our beautiful Christmas hymns, how when Jesus was born in Bethlehem the wise men from the East saw a wonderful star which showed them the way, that they might go and do honour to the child, and on the same night an angel came to some simple shepherds, out in the fields, and told them of the birth of Jesus—"Good tidings of great joy," and then suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, singing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace."

"It came upon the midnight clear,
That glorious song of old,
From angels bending near the earth
To touch their harps of gold:
'Peace to the earth, goodwill to men
From heaven's all-gracious King!'
The world in solemn stillness lay
To hear the angels sing."

It is a lovely story, but just a story, woven out of the tender imagination, the love and wonder of the people of the olden time. Really we are almost certain that Jesus was born, not at Bethlehem, but in his own home at Nazareth, and at the time the world heard nothing about it; only his father and mother had that great gladness of his coming, and their friends rejoiced with them. But afterwards, when he had lived his wonderful life, and the people had heard his teaching and felt the power of his pure and beautiful influence, when he had suffered so bravely and patiently his cruel death and his followers had come to understand the victory of his spirit over death, and to think of the heavenly life into which he had entered, then when they went out to carry his message of the new and better life to the world questions were asked, not only about his teaching and his death, but about his birth; and as the people of those days expected marvellous things, those beautiful old stories came to be told. They were repeated from mouth to mouth, and soon were believed as literally true. But we see now that they are just beautiful pictures of the imagination, and we take them as a sign of the love the people had for Jesus.

They contain lessons of the great truths he taught, and so we still delight in them at Christmas time. For it was indeed to bring peace that he came, and goodwill among men, and the glory of a new and purer life.

And if we would have the true happiness of this time we must attend to the deep truths he taught, and see that they rule in our lives. We must build on the foundation of righteousness, and remember that it is the pure in heart who have the vision of God. We must learn, with him, to trust in the perfect love of our heavenly Father, and live always in the spirit of unselfishness and loving-kindness. Then there comes to us the happiest quietness of heart even in times of trouble and sorrow, and we have visions of beauty and joy in this world, which is now our home; and in the thought of the heavenly life, which is to come, such as the selfish never have.

We think of that story of the angels thronging about the shepherds in the quiet night and singing of glory to God and Peace on earth as very beautiful, but if we have the heart of love and trust as Jesus had, we shall feel the glory of God all about us in the quiet evening, when in the light of a wonderful sunset, we seem to see straight into a new heaven, and can picture to ourselves the thronging angels there, or in the silent night under the star-lit heavens; and when we really know the secret of unselfish love, and what is done and suffered in this world of ours, then we shall know that angels of God are always with us—in mother's love, often in the face of a little child, and in many an act of simple kindness. It is in our common life that we must find the most wonderful and beautiful things. Christmas makes us understand that.

HOW A DOLL BECAME A MINISTERING ANGEL.

I AM only a dolly, and the first thing I remember is being taken out of a close, dark place, which I afterwards found was a drawer in the upper room of a large shop. Then I was laid with some other dolls on the counter, and we were taken up and examined one after the other by a well-dressed, bright-eyed girl, who presently said, "I will take this one." And I was the one.

So I was wrapped up and taken away, and when I next saw daylight I was in a pretty room. Presently my new mistress began dressing me. Such pretty things she put on me, and then, holding me up in her hands, she said softly, "There, dolly, you look very sweet; your pretty dark hair and eyes and rosy cheeks make you quite a beauty, and I am sure somebody will love you." That made me feel very glad.

In a few minutes I was packed up and put away, and when I was next brought out it was to be laid on a table, where there were several other dolls, and quite a number of toys of different kinds. Presently some little girls came into the room with a tall lady, who was their teacher. The little girls were called up one by one to receive a toy or a doll. There was a lady standing by the table to give away the things, and she had a kind word for each of the children. Presently I was given to a little fair girl with cheeks as rosy as my own. She clasped me to her breast, and looked very lovingly down at me, her face covered with smiles. All at once she recollected that she had not thanked the lady for her treasure; so, holding me still tightly clasped in her arms, she turned and said, "Thank you, ma'am," and then hurried back to her place.

My new mistress took me home and showed me to her mother. I saw this was quite a different home from my last. There was no carpet on the floor, and no pretty curtains at the window, but the mother spoke very kindly to her little girl, and I noticed she had a very nice face; and everything in the house was clean.

Several other children soon came in, and Katie, for that was my mistress's name, showed me to them, and she allowed a little girl named Rosie to hold me, and kiss me, but she soon wanted me again to nurse and pet.

When bed-time came I was laid in my box with a good-night kiss, and I felt so happy, for I knew Katie loved me. But a few days after, when Katie took me out, I saw that she was crying. I was very much surprised. Katie was so rosy and bright whenever I saw her that I could not understand why she should be so sad. Soon she told me. "You darling, I love you very much," she said, "but I must give you up. There is a little sick girl in the hospital, and she is in great pain. I am so sorry for her, and mother says we must do something to show when we are sorry for people. And oh, dollie dear, I must give you up. I have nothing else to give. If I could not run about and play, but had to lie in bed all day, I should like somebody to give me a dolly. So I will send you to comfort the little girl. But don't think I shall ever forget you, my sweet Dolly." She kissed me a great many times, and hastily wrapping me up, carried me downstairs.

Here there was a lady in a plain, blue dress and bonnet, who was talking to Katie's mother. "Nurse," said Katie softly, "I send my dolly to the little sick girl in your ward." "Oh! thank you, dear," said the nurse, "that is kind of you. I am sure it will please her very much."

So then she took me to the hospital, into a large room, where there were several nurses, all dressed alike, in white aprons and caps. They were talking about Christmas and what they could do to make the sick children happy. I could tell from what they said that none of these children could run about and play. They were all ill, and must spend their Christmas Day in bed.

"We will write each one a Santa Claus letter," a nurses said, "and give each of them a little present." "In the night when they are all asleep we will go round and put them on their beds, where they will be seen directly the children wake up."

"Yes," said the nurse who had brought me, "that will be lovely, and we will give the little black girl this dark-haired doll. I'm sure she will like that." "Poor little thing" said another, "she will not want it long, but we will give her as much happiness as we can." So, on Christmas Eve I was laid upon a bed in which was a sleeping child. Not a pretty child like Katie, but a dark-skinned, black-haired child. As she moved in her sleep, a low moan of pain came from her lips. She must be ill, I thought, though I had never seen anybody ill before. The nurse came up to the bed and gave her something to drink, speaking kindly to her, and arranging the bed-clothes. Then the moans ceased, and the child slept again. How beautifully clean everything was. The nurse moved from bed to bed so quietly, smoothing the bed-clothes and attending to the sick children.

Soon the daylight began to appear, and one of the children awoke. She saw her Christmas present, and began at once to unpack it. Her exclamations of joy awoke my little girl. She looked round and saw me. Oh, the look of delight that came into her large dark eyes! She did not attempt to take me up until the nurse said, "Beatrice, that dolly is for you." She was too happy to speak. She took me up with her little hot hands—not pretty pink ones like Katie's, but brown, thin hands, and holding me close to her breast, rocked me to and fro. Then she began to speak in a hoarse tone. "Did Santa Claus come last night? and is this my dollie? and this letter—is it for me?" "Yes, all for you," said the nurse.

"Oh, you darling," said Beatrice, "what a pretty dollie! Look at her beautiful rosy cheeks, nurse!" Then I felt very happy again, and wished Katie could have seen this poor little girl's delight.

For two days and nights little Beatrice poured a stream of love upon me. She called me by loving names, she examined and admired my clothing, stopping every few minutes to kiss my lips and cheeks. Soon, however, she ceased to sit up, but lay with her arms around me, and with my rosy cheek close to her dark, hot one. All the time the nurse came and went, ever watching, ever caring for her. Presently the arms relaxed, and her breathing became very quiet; and then the watchful nurse lifted Beatrice in her arms. After a few minutes she gently laid her down, and I noticed how still she was, for little Beatrice was dead.

Once again I was being packed up by the same nurse who brought me to the hospital. "Yes," I heard her say to somebody, "this doll was a ministering angel to that poor child. She loved it, and it made her perfectly happy for the last two days of her life. I shall take it back to Katie now."

Oh, the thrill of joy I felt to go back to bright-eyed, rosy Katie. It seemed too good to be true. Then I thought of poor little Beatrice, and that made me sad. Yet, somehow I felt that Beatrice no longer wanted me, while I knew that Katie did.

When the nurse told Katie and her mother of the comfort I had been to the little sick child, they both shed tears. Katie clasped me in her arms and said, "You dear darling, I'm so glad you're come back to me. But I am not sorry I let you go, because you made that little child happy; and teacher said last Sunday, 'whoever makes a little child happy, if only for one hour, is a fellow-worker with God.'"

ON EARTH PEACE.

"PEACE SUNDAY" and Christmas Eve fall together this year, and all the music of the Christmas gladness may be poured into that enduring human aspiration after peace and a true brotherhood among men.

There are reasons for special thankfulness this year. Even amid the confusion and horrors of the revolution now convulsing the Russian Empire, one cannot forget the immense relief brought in the summer by the conclusion of the war in the Far East, and, undoubtedly, we may rejoice over the growing improvement in the relations between the great Western nations of Europe. The cordial interchange of acts of friendship between this country and France is becoming an accepted tradition, with happiest promise for the future. What is so admirable is that it is not only diplomatists, but representative bodies of the people who are asserting themselves, and giving free scope to their natural sympathies. The thought of any difference or collision, which could issue in war between us and our nearest neighbours, is growingly felt to be impossible, as it is between us and our kindred across the Atlantic.

And now we notice with great thankfulness the beginning of a similar movement of approach between our people and the German nation. A section of the Press in both countries has been too long following the disastrous and criminal course of fomenting mutual jealousies and misunderstanding, but here again the more serious and enlightened elements of the people begin to assert themselves, as in all the nations the solidarity of labour has long been making in the same direction. The meeting last Sunday in Berlin of over two thousand members of the Senior Merchants' Guild, in the great hall of the Stock Exchange, was a most significant and hopeful sign of the approach of a happier understanding. A resolution was unanimously passed, expressing pleasure in "all efforts tending to promote friendly relations between the English and the German peoples," and the conviction that "friendly relations between Germany and England will be not only to the spiritual and material benefit of the two nations, but also to that of the whole world."

The speaking was very cordial, the memory of old acts of friendship being recalled, from early days to the time of the war of 1870, and the beneficent influence of the Emperor FREDERICK, as making strongly in that direction. Herr SCHRADER, who is a member of the Reichstag and President of the Protestantenverein, was one of the speakers who pleaded warmly for Anglo-German friendship, as the best guarantee for the maintenance of Liberalism. He welcomed our new Liberal Government as a thorough friend of peace, and said that Germany ought heartily to grasp the hand stretched out by Lord AVEBURY. Sir HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN has expressed his warm sympathy with the object of the meeting, and is said to have been cordially congratulated by Prince VON BÜLOW on his accession to office.

To these thoughts in our striving after peace must be added an earnest consideration of the condition of our people at home, for better understanding and truer sympathies in our common life. This is the great office of Christmas, and we must pray that it may work mightily towards that happy end.

THE SHEPHERD'S SONG.

"ENGLAND'S Helicon, or the Muses' Harmony," was one of those poetical miscellanies, with cumbrous, far-fetched titles, which marked the late Elizabethan and early Jacobean periods of English literature. It was published in 1600, and amongst its names of authors were those of Sidney, Spenser, and Raleigh, with others less known to fame. Least known, perhaps, of the living contributors was Edmund Bolton, then but twenty-five; and, of the five pieces contributed by him, the most conspicuous was simply "The Shepheard's Song: a Caroll or Himne for Christmas."

Even in later years Bolton was better known as a critic, historian, and antiquarian than as a poet. He was a member of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and afterwards of the Inner Temple, but the Catholic faith, to which he remained constant, was a sore hindrance to his advancement, both in public esteem and amongst men of letters, and he died, it is believed, in great poverty. In his "Hypercritica"—Four Addresses on the Cultivation of Style—he names those prose writers who, in his opinion, deserved to be studied for literary expression, and he speaks of their works as "garden-plots, out of which to gather English language." Of poetry he professes himself to be no great judge, though the judgment of critics to-day would probably be that, whilst his own prose style is generally turgid and pedantic, his poetry is singularly free from affectation, and full of delicate and easy movement. "The Shepheard's Song" may be read again and again with increasing delight in the pastoral grace, at once simple and stately, which flows through it. It is itself a little anthology, out of which the careful reader may cull more than one choice flower of English speech.

THE SHEPHEARD'S SONG.

Sweet music, sweeter far
Than any song is sweet;
Sweet music, heavenly rare,
Mine eyes, O peers, doth greet.
Yon gentle flocks, whose fleeces, pearled with dew,
Resemble heaven, whom golden drops
make bright,
Listen, O listen now, O not to you
Our pipes make sport to shorten weary night.
But voices most divine
Make blissful harmony,
Voices that seem to shine,
For what else clears the sky?
Tunes can we hear, but not the singers
see,
The tunes divine, and so the singers be.

Lo, how the firmament
Within an azure fold
The flock of stars hath pent,
That we might them behold.
Yet from their beams proceeded not this light,
Nor can their crystals such reflection give.
What then doth make the element so bright?
The heavens are come down on earth to live.
But hearken to the song,
Glory to glory's King
And peace all men among,
These quiristers do sing.
Angels they are, as also shepherds be,
Whom in our fear we do admire to see.

Let not amazement blind
Your souls, said he, annoy;
To you and all mankind
My message bringeth joy;
For lo, the world's great Shepherd now is born,
A blessed babe, an infant full of power:
After long night uprisen is the morn,
Renowning Bethl'em in the Saviour.
Sprung is the perfect day,
By prophets seen afar;
Sprung is the mirthful May,
Which winter cannot mar.
In David's city doth his sun appear Clouded in flesh, yet, shepherds, sit we here.

THE memorial pamphlet containing a biographical sketch and portrait of the late Rev. Richard Lyttle is now in its second edition. It contains also a number of newspaper tributes and a fuller account than we were able to publish at the time of the remarkable demonstration of public regard at the funeral. The pamphlet has been sent out with an appeal for the fund which is being raised to erect Memorial Schools at Moneyrea. Donations may be be sent to the Rev. Charles Peach, 68, Richmond-grove, Manchester.

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

LIVERPOOL MEMORIAL IN HOPE STREET CHURCH.

THE service for the dedication of the memorial tablet to Dr. Martineau, placed in Hope-street Church to commemorate the centenary of his birth last April, was held on Thursday evening, December 14. There was a large congregation, many members of Ullet-road and the Ancient Chapel joining in the service, as they had done also in the subscription for the erection of the memorial. Among those present were Dr. Martineau's three surviving children. The service was conducted by the Revs. H. D. Roberts and J. Collins Odgers, the address being given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Manchester College, Oxford.

The tablet, which was unveiled before the service began, is placed on the wall by the pulpit, to the preacher's right hand. In the centre is a medallion portrait of Dr. Martineau in white marble, life-size, and in high relief. The oval in which it is set is surrounded by a broad band of Irish marble of a soft green colour. Three sides of this are square, the top only being curved, and surmounted by an enriched cornice. In an oblong panel below the portrait is the inscription :—

"In grateful remembrance of James Martineau, D.D., D.C.L. Born April 21, 1805, died January 11, 1900. Minister of this church from its erection in 1849 until his removal to London in 1857 and previously minister to the same congregation, in Paradise-street Chapel, from 1832 to 1848. April, 1905."

On either side of the portrait, in foliated niches, are symbolic figures of "Knowledge" and "Truth," the laurel and oak of the foliage climbing up and intertwining in the centre of the cornice, over the portrait. The whole of this surrounding part of the tablet is in alabaster of a beautiful rose colour.

The service opened with Watts' hymn : "O God, our help in ages past," and after prayer came two of Dr. Martineau's canticles, "I was glad" and "Sing no more the song of Moses," with the lessons in between. These were Matt. xxv. 1—13 (the lesson from which at the first Sunday morning service in the church, Dr. Martineau took the text of his sermon on "The Watch-Night Lamps"), 1 Cor. iii. 1—11, and Ecclesiasticus xliv. 1—8, 15, "Let us now praise famous men." Prayer followed the second canticle, and then Samuel Longfellow's hymn, "God of Ages and of Nations," and after the address another hymn of Longfellow's : "One holy church of God appears."

THE ADDRESS.

For a quarter of a century James Martineau was pastor of the congregation which, in 1849, entered this house of prayer. He came to Liverpool in 1832, as colleague to the Rev. John Grundy in the Paradise-street Chapel. Ere his thirtieth birthday he assumed sole charge, which he vacated only in 1857 when he removed to London, to fill the chair of moral and religious philosophy in Manchester New College. In commemoration of this ministry of two decades and a half, you dedicate this tablet in connection with the centenary of his birth ; and you ask me to gather up in a few minutes the characteristics of those fruitful years.

Their outward incidents were few. In the work of the teacher, the crises of interest are for the most part hidden in the solitary chamber, where study begets thought, and memory breeds reflection, and the rush of new ideas fills the mind with silent wonder, or awe melts into trust as the conscience yields up its secrets in speechless reverence for the All-Holy. The pastor's finest work was doubtless wrought out in solitude, but its materials were found in the midst of his fellow-men. He was a student and a thinker, living laborious days, but he was no recluse. The home was joyous with the happy laughter of the young. He loved to gather friends beside his hearth. John Hamilton Thom was as the brother of his soul. He caught the enthusiasm of Dr. Tuckerman. He rested under the serenity of John James Tayler. He learned of Blanco White, and Francis Newman. He was the correspondent of men as far apart as John Stuart Mill and Dr. Channing. Moreover, he witnessed the expansion of your city. He loved its river and its ships. He studied the growth of its trade ; he analysed the processes of commerce ; he understood the merchant's enterprise, and fathomed his risk. An eager advocate of political reform, he observed the making and the undoing of ministries ; he weighed the character of the statesman, and followed the aims of the philanthropist. He shared in the activities of education ; he noted the progress of literature, and was at home in the discoveries of science. He touched life in these eager years at many points, and lived with an intensity that was possible only to the rarest ardour and the most simple-minded self-control. He knew the trials and joys of the common lot. He brought up a large family upon small means. He watched beside the death bed of a boy of richest promise ; he saw the sons and daughters whom he had trained himself enter into the engagements of life ; and all the while he was laying broad and deep the foundations of Knowledge, and disciplining his soul in homage to Truth.* The actual literary product of these years was, indeed, relatively small ; three or four slender volumes of lectures and sermons, a few groups of brilliant essays, would exhaust the tale. Had he done nothing more, they would have sufficed to show how potent a spirit had dwelt in your midst, but they would not have won for him the crown of later fame. Yet these years were the seed-plot of all that was afterwards ripest in his genius, and here he made firm the beginings of subsequent achievement and renown. An extraordinary industry, an astonishing concentration of purpose, knit his days together. He practised the strictest economy of time. Shy he might seem to those who approached him with any kind of timidity or constraint ; but those who knew the secrets of the home, were well aware how tender was his sympathy. They needed but to ask and they would receive ; and the rich bounty of his nature learned thereby more confidence in its own power to help and cheer.

When James Martineau came to the pastorate of this congregation, he had already given distinguished proof of his moral courage by declining at Dublin to share in the annual distribution of the Regium Donum. It was the first protest which circumstances demanded of him against the received tradition of his household of faith. In other respects, he was a Unitarian of the straitest type. He had early yielded his allegiance to Priestley, to whom he owed his first intellectual apprehension of the unity and omnipresence of the divine energy in the world ; and he had willingly surrendered himself to the sovereignty of a pantheistic necessity, unconscious of any contradiction in his own experience, and lost in the majesty of one controlling Cause, which, working everywhere, did everything well. Not for some years did he enter into full possession of himself. But the searching questions of the young opened within him deeps which the analysis of philosophy had not revealed, and when once the conscience awoke to the meaning of its divine authority, he parted from Belsham to listen to the voices of insight speaking through Coleridge and Carlyle, Wordsworth and Channing. New conceptions of the solemnity of life and the grandeur of human destiny now dawned upon him ; and he passed into an august fellowship with the Infinite Perfection who deigned to utter the law of right within his soul, and make him a conscious partner in the great purpose of eternal good. It was the hour of a new spiritual birth, not reached, indeed, by any sudden spasms of self-conviction, but slowly wrought out from the contents of his experience, and destined to serve as the ground of faith, and supply the rule of judgment, for the great ethical and religious structures of the future. To a spirit which thus saw in man the present reality of revelation, which heard in the commanding voice "Thou oughtest" the very speech of heaven, and found in the pure heart a temple of divine life, the rigid Evangelicalism which prevailed around him seemed like defamation of the Maker's work. The doctrine of total depravity struck at the very root of his fundamental conviction, "the living union of God with our humanity." The scheme of vicarious atonement cut athwart the first principles of justice ; and the doctrine of eternal torment, following on arbitrary election, was a mockery of God's righteousness and love. The brilliant lectures which he contributed to the famous Liverpool controversy, revealed the full extent of his revolt against the philosophical necessarianism of his youth, and the theological necessarianism of his environment. Never before had the Evangelical doctrine been subjected to such searching criticism. It was the more poignant and penetrating because the critic took no easy-going view of God's demands. He, no less than his clerical antagonists, laid the utmost emphasis on human sin. He tracked it through every maze of man's nature. He tore off its disguises ; he insisted on its recognition ; he dwelt on the stern realities of its moral retribution ; he gave it a new place in Unitarian devotion, and added a hitherto unheard note of confession and humility to our hymnody. So constant was his attitude that he could even describe the whole language of Christian piety as a "wail of penitence," and the sigh of failure was heard as the undertone of his loftiest teaching. In this respect he was in marked accord with both the great types of historic Christianity, the Catholic as well as the Evangelical. The year after his settlement here the great Anglican revival began. He poured scorn on its attempted justification of non-natural interpretation of the Articles, but he sympathised profoundly with the theological movement which shifted the centre of Christian truth from the Atonement to the Incarnation. As he studied the fusion of Hebrew and Hellenic ideas in the early centuries of church history, he saw a manifest witness of Providence in the interpretation of Christ's person in terms of the Godhead as well as the humanity. There was the supreme exemplification of his favourite doctrine of the perennial indwelling of the living God in man as well as in the universe. But for the ecclesiastical forms of this idea, and the sacerdotal pretensions raised upon it, he had small patience. Not till it was taken out of the keeping of a priestly corporation, could he expand it to the full scope of human nature. In Christ he saw the realised type of a personal revelation implicit in all. In that Son of God he learned to behold the manifestation of the Father; and there was in every man, by the very constitution of his being, provision for the maintenance and development of a supernatural life, a life above the pledged order of God's laws in outward nature, a life in which the soul could aspire towards the divine affection, and the infinite Spirit could respond with free bounties of grace. But these depended on no external rites; they were not connected with prescribed words, or entrusted to the keeping of a hierarchy and a creed. In this respect James Martineau, like his friend, Francis Newman, stood side by side with the Evangelical in common protest against priestly claims. Life in the spirit was in the guardianship of no sacred order; it depended on no water, word, or sacramental bread; it was God's gift to the soul of endeavour and of trust; and the testimony to it lay within. Listen to the solemn call of duty in which already God manifests his righteousness in our own souls, and you will know that he teaches us by the law of service that he may train us for the liberty of his children. Through the religion of obedience he prepares us for the religion of communion. This was, in brief, the new interpretation of Christianity which guided the worship of this place. It was based on two great orders of experience, the historic realisation of religion in the records of the primitive church, and the testimony of life in the believer to-day. A devoted student of the New Testament, James Martineau brought to the investigation of its writings a fearless criticism which broke down the traditional Unitarian view of Scriptural authority. Year after year he pursued his way, communicating his results with slow and cautious steps to his classes, while, on the field of philosophy, he was working out the intellectual and moral justification of the truth which he found in Jesus, and verified in the sanctities of man's own being. Looking back at four-score and ten over his long and difficult way, he saw that this had been in reality the directing aim of all his course—to replace a religion at second-hand copied from an ancient book by a religion at first hand, known in the immediate interaction of the soul and God. This was the purpose which history and philosophy in his hands combined to fulfil, and here was a foundation which criticism could not undermine nor science shake.

Many were the results that followed from this central principle. However securely religion might be lodged in the temple of the soul, it was after all no purely individual possession. The very fact that provision for it was involved in the structure of man's nature, begot common needs and produced common aspirations. To mature these was the function of the Church which was the organ of united witness to the truth, the mother of corporate endeavour, the scene of a Christian brotherhood of worship and service. As each successive group of believers gathered beneath the eye of God, and reared their homes of faith and prayer, what principle knit them together, rising out of their retrospect of the past and shaping their hope for the future? Not the maintenance of a common doctrine, for in the ordering of God the truth of one generation might be expanded or corrected by the next. When the foundation stone of this church was laid, he repudiated all attempts to "fix the type of belief from age to age." Here, for the first time he gave effect to the lesson which he had learned through the slow pleadings that wound their tortuous way from court to court up to the House of Lords, and finally produced the Dissenters' Chapels Act of 1844. Here he proclaimed that the providential law of change, the openness to new truth, the conception of a progressive revelation of God's ways to man, should be frankly recognised as fact, and allowed for in our provisions for posterity. "I am a Unitarian," he declared, "you who will meet here from week to week are doubtless Unitarian too; but the society of worshippers of which we are only the living members, and the Church erected here of which we shall be but the transient tenants, these are not to be defined as Unitarian. To stamp them with such doctrinal name would be to perform an act of posthumous expulsion against many noble dead whom it is an honour to revere, and perhaps to provoke against ourselves from a future age the retribution of a like excommunication." To this principle he was again and again to give firm and decisive utterance, till it became the recognised basis of our church-life, the distinctive note of our religious worship. For its sake he bore much misunderstanding, and faced many difficulties. With infinite patience he sought again and again to give it fresh illustration, and guard it from the charge of involving indifference to truth. The experiment of a Free Christian Union might fail. Proposals for the organisation of our congregations, or the federation of the various religious bodies of this country with the Anglican church, might be rejected. But to his ideal of a Catholic communion of spirit transcending divergences of doctrine, James Martineau remained true to his last hour.

Was not this already realised, moreover, in the high utterances of praise and prayer? From the stress of theological debate he turned to the lyrics of devotion, and by his "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home" gave a new impulse to worship in sacred song. What fresh notes of piety were heard when the chorus of trust and aspiration was enriched by the voices of Catholic and Puritan, Anglican and Wesleyan; and who that has read the great sermon on "The Communion of Saints" with which the book was introduced, can forget that searching appeal to realise the deep and widespread union of hearts lying beneath the discords of the sects! The plea has become so familiar to us now, however imperfect our opportunity to give it practical effect, that we hardly comprehend how novel it first sounded more than two generations ago. It brought this congregation, with a hundred others in its train, and many a trustful spirit beyond the reach of our corporate life, into truer sympathy with the historic faiths of Christendom, and made us feel that no ecclesiastical barriers could really shut us out as strangers or exiles, or deprive us of a place in the household of God.

Worship, then, was the primary means by which the Church ought to make itself the home of those Angels of Endeavour, Humiliation, Trust, Service, and Communion, which he saw presiding over the Christian life.* But to worship the Pastor with unfailing diligence added instruction. Year after year he made the young his special care. He gathered them into Sunday classes. He led them through the Gospel narratives; he unfolded to them the secrets of Paul; he showed them the development of doctrine and ritual in the Church; he expounded the principles of religious philosophy in simple form; he made them feel the mysteries and look into the deeps of their own hearts. From time to time the treatment of the great themes might vary. He was even exposed to charges of love of change for its own sake. The fact was that his intellectual conscientiousness was so sensitive, his susceptibility to new aspects of truth so swift, that more sluggish minds could not always follow him, and recoiled from the difficulties or resented the efforts which his teaching involved. But on the more active spirits he produced an ineffaceable impression. Wide as was his learning, penetrating as was his insight, he did not seem to them to impose his results upon them by authority, so much as to guide them to the heights whence they could see the realities he saw.

But worship and instruction were both regarded as the preparation for life; and to the interpretation of life the Preacher devoted his highest powers. It was in this church that he said, six years after he had left it, "The place where I stand is perhaps the spot of all the world where I have most lived, most hoped, most loved, most suffered." More even than in his own home among his nearest and dearest, did the burden of prophecy in the sanctuary bring him close to the world's pain, and open to him the secret of weakness merged in a diviner strength. Lofty was his conception of the preacher's work, for it was nothing less than the soliloquy of the soul to God. And this could not be punctually produced from week to week, the fire of the spirit could not be self-kindled, and there were times when the heavenly flame burned low. But two great ideas informed the whole, the idea of duty, and the idea of communion. They were, indeed, but different aspects of one ultimate reality, that presence of God in the soul of man which was the central fact of all religion. To replenish the springs of that life, to clear away the veils of selfishness or untrustful care, to undo the meshes of custom, and turn a cold obedience to law into a glowing harmony of affection, was the aim of those sermons which became among us household words. In the "Endeavours" he preached not only to one congregation, but to all with fit ears in the Church Universal. They spoke with a new language; in them we learned to breathe the airs of heaven. Through all the elaboration of their expression there shone a high austere simplicity of faith. The elements of life in all souls, courage and trust, humility and aspiration, were robed with that vesture of imagination which makes poetry the handmaid of religion, and reveals to us the unseen through the beauty of the seen. But his touch was always close upon the common needs, and a rich store of observation and experience, of mingled irony and sympathy, makes these pages as fresh to-day as they were sixty years ago.

Nor was the preacher concerned only with individual needs, or the incidents of personal history. The principles of duty are of general application. They belong to all forms of organised effort for the welfare of others; to the church, with its provision for social service, and its fraternity of benevolent effort; to the city with its manifold forms of municipal enterprise, and its perils of municipal corruption; to commerce, where the integrity of trade and manufacture can only be secured by the joint faithfulness of employers and employed; to the nation, charged with the welfare of its citizens, and bound to make justice the fundamental basis of the state, alike in the control of wealth at home, and in the promotion of righteousness and peace abroad. Deeply was he distressed by the ignorance, the squalor, the poverty, of large masses of the people in our great cities. To the cause of education in the Day and Sunday schools maintained by this congregation, with all their associated labours of helpfulness, he was untiringly devoted. He aided the teachers; he gave religious instruction every week to the boys and girls; he guided the efforts of the visitors who sought out the sick and the needy. He took part in founding the Domestic Mission, and was its ever-active friend. When the temperance movement was started, he saw at once its immense possibilities and far reaching effects, and, by personal example and public advocacy, he commended it to all. True, he might disparage "disciplinarian methods for the administration of churches, for the propagation of personal influence, and the voluntary management of Christian men." He lived in a world of ideal aims, and he had confidence that all might do the same.

But great as he was as a teacher, his own attitude was always that of a disciple. In the realm of the intellect we looked upon him as one of the great masters of his age; but in the field of religion he counted himself among dependent minds. He trusted another rather than himself. He loved a higher spirit than his own; he could not live without someone to revere, and he found the object of his reverence in Christ. Some of his contemporaries thought that he weakened the grounds of historic faith by a destructive criticism. He could not understand the preference for an official Messiah in place of a spiritual Revealer. It was not because Jesus knew more, but because he was nobler, that he became a mediator, an uplifter, an inspirer for other men. And this function is passed on from age to age, and realised afresh whenever we see another conquer where we have been overcome, or are caught up into new strength by his faithfulness. Such living testimony to divine things you have discerned in James Martineau, whose marble image you place upon your walls between the symbols of Knowledge and of Truth. Not without significance is it that an adjoining tablet commemorates a fresher grief. Your late Pastor, Richard Acland Armstrong, was pre-eminent among his pupils alike for his comprehension and his exposition of the philosophy of our common teacher. But he was more; he was also in our midst an unexampled moral force; we hardly knew till he had gone from us how we had found in him our stay and help. They were the witnesses among us in succeeding generations that "it is ever the greater spirits that morally sustain the less." Such rare souls are, indeed, unconscious of their elevation. They see only the heights they have not reached; they mourn the endeavours that have failed. But to us who know that we rise by their might, the sigh of defeat is lost in the hymn of thanksgiving. Even here they were the agents of the continuous revealing of the sons of God. They enter the higher fellowship of the wise and holy. It is for us to share their trust, and follow their example; may it be also to pass into their peace.

A CIVIC MARTYR.

By Mrs. Bayle-Bernard.

"What is holy ground?" asks the Zendavesta, and then answers itself:—"The spot where a good man treads, that is holy ground." Surely the spot where a good man lies interred must share the consecration, and truly hallowed is that defaced and fractured stone in Dantsic Cathedral which marks where lie the remains of the noble Coural Letzkau, one who lived the champion of the oppressed and died a martyr in the cause of Freedom. A cousin of the Grand Master of the Order of Teutonic knights, and brought up from childhood in their service, he was, towards the end of the fourteenth century, by their influence chosen Burgomaster, in the belief that having secured this important position for a creature of their own, they would met with no efficient opposition to their tyranny. But though brought up among them he was not of them, and the only rule he owned was that of right. No sooner was he elected than he declared that henceforth his duty to the citizens whom he represented was paramount to any obligations he might owe to the Order, and regardless of the powerful enmity he thus provoked he invariably upheld the privileges of the City against their constant encroachments. The struggle began when, having already claimed two-thirds of all the amber wrought in Dantsic as its special article of commerce, they now sought to deprive the burghers of their hitherto unquestioned right to the remaining third. Baffled in this by the bold resistance of the townspeople under the leadership of their chief magistrate, they then sought to ruin them by diverting their business into another channel. The newer portion of the City had been entirely settled by them as a stronghold for their adherents when they first took possession of the original old town, but the commercial spirit had prevailed over the military, and the two towns now formed but one mercantile community, with identical interests and equally disposed to resist the exactions of their martial rulers. The knights therefore now began to build another addition, intending to make it so formidable a rival as to force the older City into complete submission. They accordingly offered special privileges to all who would remove to this new district, even presenting a house in it to the English to induce them to carry on exclusively there the trade they had established in varnish, the chief ingredient in which was dissolved amber. In every way the young community was favoured, and as this was a violation of the solemn covenant they had made with the burghers, Letzkau at last told the Knights to their face that if they broke the promises they had given under hand and seal they were less worthy of honour than the common people they so despised, since the meanest of these would hold it a disgrace to break his word; and he warned them that if the citizens' burdens were made yet heavier, and their freedom interfered with, it could not be expected they would keep to their allegiance, while if driven to rebellion the consequences would be serious to the Order. This steady resistance and plain speaking quite alienated all the patriotic Burgomaster's former friends, while to the ill-will of the Order was added the violent personal animosity of the Commander, whom he had thwarted in an attempt to get all the mills and cranes of the City farmed to himself. At length the Grand Master, fearing grave damage to their cause from this strife, came himself to Dantzic to mediate between the opposing parties, and effected at least an apparent reconciliation, the Commander and the Council agreeing to compose their differences and taking a solemn oath "with mouth and hand" in the Church, to forget the past and henceforth live in amity. After the Grand Master left, the Commander kept up the show of friendship for some time, and to confirm the recently pledged alliance, on Palm Sunday sent an invitation to Letzkau and three of his colleagues to come and sup with him at the Castle. They were then guests at the house of another Counsellor, but, unwilling to show mistrust or give fresh cause of offence, excused themselves to their host and at once set off. On the road they met the Commander's Fool, who either lacking discretion, or humanely desirous to give a warning, said with a laugh—"If you knew what is intended you would not join the meal to-day." They took no notice and passed on, but soon after one of them, suddenly stopping, said he had left the key in his money-chest and must hasten back to secure it. Perhaps he had taken alarm at the Fool's speech, or felt some presentiment of evil, for on reaching home he stayed there making no effort to rejoin his companions, who went on until another's heart began to fail, and saying he did not like the Fool's speech, suggested that they should all turn back. But Letzkau's bolder spirit felt no fear, and he represented that to show any discourtesy might destroy the new friendship, while if even any wrong were intended it would not cost them their heads. They therefore entered the Castle without further hesitation, and were politely received on the drawbridge by some of the knights. But the moment they had crossed, the gates were shut and the bridge drawn up, while the ill-omened laugh of the Fool, who had followed them, rang out again as he cried mockingly, "Ha! ha! so the birds are caught." His gibe was soon made clear when, on reaching the Hall, the Commander and a number of the Brethren greeted them as "Villains," and abusively reproached them for always opposing the Order. They at first remonstrated that they had only done what was right. "Right! right!" interrrupted the Commander, "your only right was to be obedient." Letzkau finding that here indeed might alone was right, would not stoop to further disputation, but calmly turning to his son-in-law Hecht exclaimed "You see how it is with us;" then as the sense of powerlessness shot a pang to his heart, added with momentary emotion: "Oh! I would give 1,000 florins to have a good sword in my hand this day."

The Commander now called for the executioner, and peremptorily ordered him to behead these men. To his astonishment the man absolutely refused, saying that it was not his office to execute any but such as had been tried by a proper tribunal and condemned. As, though seized and beaten, the worthy fellow persisted in his refusal, the captives were ordered to be thrust into a dungeon, while the Commander and his co-conspirators sat down to supper making merry over the success of their plot. This unhallowed Sabbath festival being protracted till midnight, the wine at last drowned any remaining scruple or sense of decency, and they determined, since the professional headsman proved so uncomplying, themselves to fulfil this office. Though their defenceless prisoners had no other weapons than words the cowards shrank from encountering even these, so ordered the hapless victims to be brought before them, not only bound but gagged. Rushing with their swords first upon Letzkau, after piercing him with many wounds they finally cut his throat and then dispatched the other two in like savage manner. But though the holy Brethren were thus not ashamed to do the work the hired headsman had scorned to stain his hands with, they were not equally ready to avow their vile deed, which was accordingly kept so secret that the Council and the other citizens knew nothing of what had occurred beyond the fact that their representatives had not returned. Concluding that the knights were keeping them prisoners, they immediately sent off a deputation to the headquarters at Marienburgh to lay their complaint before the Grand Master. Meanwhile Frau Anna, Letzkau's daughter and wife to Hecht, anxious to afford some comfort to the supposed captives, took meat and wine of the best to the Castle gate, begging that it might be given to them, whereupon the Commander's men not only undertook to deliver the supply, but even brought back a pretended message of what the gentlemen would like best for their next meal; and thus the poor wife and daughter day by day prepared some fresh delicacy for her dear ones, sadly rejoicing that she could at least afford them this solace, while all the time her dainties were being devoured by the rude soldiers, with a laugh at what they deemed a good jest. This went on for six days until, on Easter Sunday, the deputation returned with a peremptory order from the Grand Master that the prisoners should be forthwith released. On this announcement a crowd of citizens gathered round the Castle gate to greet the patriots as they should come forth, their kindred pressing foremost to be ready to embrace them. But the hours went past and there were no signs of their appearance, till at last, as evening drew on, there was a stir within the Castle yard and then while every heart was throbbing with gladsome expectation, the portal opened and suddenly a mangled corpse was thrown out, and another, and another, and then the crashing gate was scornfully flung to, and all again was still within that murderous hold. But without, among the excited throng rose the wail of bitter grief, mingled with the deep murmur of manly indignation, the bereaved families mourning their husbands and fathers and the citizens lamenting their lost leader, with curses on the tyrants who had slain him. The poor disfigured bodies were respectfully taken up and soon after interred by the burghers with much ceremony and every possible mark of honour, Letzkau and his son-in-law being deposited beside the high altar in the Cathedral. The massive stone which marks the spot is riven across with a huge crack, as though the appeal of the martyrs beneath had burst the very tomb, as the cry of their blood went up to Heaven for justice on their murderers. Doubtless a day of reckoning came at last, but there seems to have been no striking or speedy retribution. The citizens were probably unable to effect anything without a chief, and the remaining counsellors intimidated by the fate of their colleagues from assuming active leadership: The Grand Master, though he had shown himself desirous to prevent mischief, did not apparently care to interfere when it had once been accomplished, for the only other fact related by the chronicler concerning the mournful history is not the infliction of any punishment on the evil-doers, but the addition to their crime of another, viz., that fourteen days after the treacherous massacre they caused the widows and orphans of the murdered counsellors to be driven forth from house and home and took possession of all their victims' property. Verily those were woful times for the weak! Happier days are ours, but never should we forget the dauntless few who "When 'twas treason to be free," dared to resist tyranny and lay down their lives in the cause of the oppressed.

FREE RELIGION IN DENMARK.*

STANDS Denmark where it did? No, the Danish people are spirited, vigorous, and enterprising in business matters, as all Western Europe now knows; and an increasing section of the Danish people would seem determined to show enterprise, to make progress, and to help their neighbours to advance in the realms of theology and religion. The leaven of religious liberalism works irresistibly, manifesting itself partly in the spread of modern rational views and a practical religion, and partly in a Free Church movement, which offers a devotional and worshipful home for free spirits. Certainly it is a necessary and noble work to show and prove that, apart from outgrown dogmas, man's religious and devotional needs can still be satisfied; there can still be the Divine communion, the united worship, which are the necessary consecration and strength of the highest, truest life and effort.

This is the kind of religious work which our friends in Denmark are faithfully doing. Pastor Uffe Birkedal and his co-workers in Copenhagen, and other steadfast witness-bearers up and down the land, are assuredly not toiling in vain. They evidently win appreciation and gain recruits, and this largely because, in the midst of all heresy and the candid expression of sincere modern thought, their emphasis is all the time placed upon the real religion which abides in presence of all change of thought or opinion, a benediction to all who sincerely embrace it and enter into its spirit and its life.

A fresh indication of the activity of our friends we welcome in the little publication referred to at the beginning of this article. The weekly paper, Lys over Landet, edited by Mr. Theo. Berg, continues its useful activity, but since the beginning of July Miss Westenholz, the secretary of the Free Church, has been editing a little sixteen page fortnightly magazine, entitled, "Protestant News," of which the aim is somewhat different.

The best indication of its spirit and purpose will be a translation, as follows, of the opening article:—

"The reason why the Free Church congregation resolved to issue this little magazine is because we felt that, in the present day, when our future ecclesiastical constitution in Denmark is being considered, there is need for a literary organ for all those who desire the maintenance of our State Church, but who perceive that its maintenance is beneficial to the people, and therefore justified only when it is so reformed that those who are no longer in harmony with out-grown dogmas and forms can still, with personal truthfulness, remain within its pale. In entitling our magazine 'Protestant News,' and in adopting as our motto Luther's great phrase, 'It is unsafe and dangerous to act against one's own conscience,' we desire to intimate that without any narrow limitation, its columns will be open to any writers whose ultimate appeal is to conscience rather than to external authorities. We do not aim to provide a new arena for theological and scientific debate, which, we think, is rather in order in the special technical journals devoted to theology or science. We do not aim to raise, far less to answer, the great question, 'What is truth?' What we do desire is that, to the best of our power, we may help any to worship God in spirit and in truth in accordance with their own personal faith. We cannot and will not for a moment conceal the fact that our religious standpoint removes us far from the church's official theology and creed and its present constitution, and that the contents of our magazine will be in harmony with the Sermon on the Mount and the Paternoster rather than with conventional creeds. But just as firmly as we hold to that which to us is true, and maintain our right to hear it proclaimed, and to openly bear witness for it in our State Church, just so zealously do we aim to defend the right of all our Protestant fellow-countrymen to the same privileges and benefits from their own point of view. All of any section or type of thought who, in brotherhood and mental liberty desire to speak forth the truth which is in them in relation to our national ecclesiastical affairs, are hereby invited to contribute to our pages."

* "Protestantisk Tidende." Published by the Free Church Congregation, Copenhagen, on the 1st and 15th of each month.

Pastor Birkedal follows with an article headed, "Back to Worms," showing that the principle which Luther advanced, but which he did not carry into logical realisation, becoming himself intolerant instead of comprehensive, is yet in itself sound and true, and justifies further modern advance in the same Protestant spirit of fidelity to conscience.

"M. B. W." considers the question: "What is conscience? what is its problem? what its goal?" It is a thoughtful survey from the historical point of view, and also in reference to the experience of the inward personal life. It allows for the development of a power in presence of the varying conditions of a progressive moral and spiritual life. The supreme hour for any man who has been reared in belief in God, whose trust in the witness of prophets and martyrs is unmovable, but who has never come face to face with God, and who at times sadly sighs, "Lord, I believe, help Thou my unbelief," is when he reaches the conviction that conscience is the voice of the living God, a revelation or an inflowing of Divine life.

As to the desire—natural enough, and really beautiful, in those who, in spite of their heresy, love the Church of the Danish people—that there shall be in the national Church, by the side of the ritual, sermons and special ministrations of orthodox clergy, an equal and openly acknowledged place for those of the modern Free Church movement in the metropolis and elsewhere, our friends have entered upon a long and arduous crusade, needing much courage and patience, and we must all honour their chivalrous intent, and know that it will at least bring the reward of inward consecration and increase of spiritual life. Meantime, although practically—if not inevitably—outside the technical organisation and communion of the State Church, they are doing good work for religion, for freedom in religion, for the extension of the invisible spiritual unity of the larger church of the future, which, under whatever name or form, shall make a home for the evolution of a spiritual humanity in the kingdom of God on earth as in heaven.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

WALES.

THE one topic of prime importance in Wales still is the Revival, not but that the termination of the coal crisis and the fall of the Government are felt to touch us very nearly.

A little more than a twelvemonth ago the young man Evan Roberts, at that time only twenty-six, unknown, comparatively illiterate, came upon the scene like a bolt from the blue, and his fame soon spread over the world almost with lightning rapidity. It is said his portrait is as well known in the chief cities of Europe and America as it is in our own towns in Wales. It is estimated that nearly 100,000 members were added to the Welsh churches during 1904–5, and mainly through his instrumentality. The question is frequently asked, and sometimes with no little misgiving, How many of these have stood-faithful? And the answer that will prove satisfactory to the doubter cannot, perhaps, be got. I have made some inquiries locally. The Rev. J. Grawys Jones (C), a near neighbour, says that nearly two hundred were added to his church during the period mentioned, and that twenty-five of these have more or less lapsed. None, however, have fallen back into their old ways; some have left the district, others have cooled down and don't take the same interest in all the services of the church as they did at first. The report of the other churches would probably be much the same.

It can never be repeated too often that the Welsh Revival is not to be placed in the same category as that of Torrey and Alexander. The contrast is very marked. There is no large financial outlay, no publication by large posters, no beat of drum or blare of trumpet; all is natural and spontaneous. Evan Roberts' first public appearance was on Sunday, November 6, 1904, at Brynseion, within five minutes' walk of the place where these lines are written, and he appeared then simply as a lay supply, taking the place of the regular minister, who failed to keep his appointment. But the "thing" caught on at once, so that on the three or four ensuing nights the largest place of worship in the district could not contain the crowds that thronged together, and overflow meetings had to be held elsewhere—this notwithstanding the fact that Evan Roberts himself only remained over Tuesday night. It was on that Sunday night the torch was applied, and the result is known. I did not see Evan Roberts on his first visit, but I attended several of the meetings that followed, and, like most others, I was simply "amazed, and marvelled." I don't pretend to explain.

On November 27 of this year he paid his second visit to this district, and the news soon spread far and near. Once more he stood in the Brynseion pulpit where he opened his mission a twelvemonth ago. The place was packed, and hundreds failed to gain admittance. I was not present at this meeting, but I hear that for some time prior to his leaving his host's house for the meeting Roberts appeared to be in great mental distress and almost afraid to attend. But they had prayers, and he became calm and bright. During the meeting he gave an address which three intelligent Unitarians described to me as excellent.

I was present on Tuesday, and on Wednesday for nearly five hours consecutively I watched the developments with much interest. They did not differ materially from those of last year. There were short speeches, recitations of passages of scripture, hymns, prayers, not according to any prescribed order, but as the Spirit moved. The prayers went on, sometimes several together, and simultaneously with the singing of hymns. Some of the prayers seemed to be given from memory, but they had the ring of conviction in them and were very beautiful and touching; others were the agonising cries of the moment, prayers for the rescue of some prodigal—a brother, a sister, a dear friend—from the error of his ways. Once or twice the whole body of the congregation seemed to have been swept off its feet. Some were laughing, some crying, some praying at the top of their voice; some seemed to be swayed by contortions of great agony; others fainted away and had to be carried out; and all was in a kind of ecstatic confusion.

Evan Roberts is undoubtedly a mystery to everybody. Those who know him best and love him most don't profess to understand him. While admitting that some of his methods may be crude and open to criticism, they have unbounded confidence in his sincerity. He is as simple as a child, yet withal as brave as a hero when the case demands. He is a strange compound of deep seriousness and winsome cheerfulness. With him storm and sunshine, tears and smiles are in close proximity, and follow each other in rapid succession. His power over the congregation is wonderful, whether to rouse or quiet it. As a rule, he does not approve of excitement, as he is himself then in a state of great agitation. He likes best the meeting that is quiet, serious, solemn, as contributing to best results. He is not responsible for the excitement, but accepts it as part of the means to the end in view. It was during an interval of quiet a middle-aged lady, in an excellent speech, said if religion was to be real it must go with us always and everywhere, weekdays as well as Sundays, at home with our daily duties as well as in church or chapel. Another lady, pressing the same lesson home, said she began a twelvemonth ago by trying as far as she could to be like Mary, but as a result she found disorder and discord at home. This year she had made up her mind that she must be a Martha as well as a Mary if she wished to find peace.

It is not an uncommon remark during times of revival that efforts are made to pray, but that the voices are not heard owing to the noise—as if the prayers were intended for the human and not the Divine ear. But what is Prayer? What is its real inner meaning? Is it mere meditation, or has it an objective end and aim? Is it something intended for the congregation solely, or is it directed to a Supreme Being? In public worship the minister does not pray to the congregation, but tries to lead the congregation in its worship of Almighty God. It is often mentioned as a fault in Evan Roberts that he allows a meeting to pass without ever saying a word. Others may be taking part and he may be praying all the time. "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of." It is reported that on the 5th inst., at a meeting of 3,000 people at Pwllheli, which was kept going till nearly eleven o'clock, he never uttered a word. One of the things that he is constantly troubled about is that people should look to him as if he were somebody, instead of looking to Jesus and to God. He himself disclaims all credit personally.

His religion is life to Evan Roberts. He is devotional to an extreme, spending most of his waking hours reading his Bible, with which he is as familiar as with the multiplication table; or he is engaged in prayer, or perhaps jotting down notes for future use. There is no doubt much of the mystic in him, which would argue a near relationship in some respects to the Quaker. He sees visions, dreams dreams, hears voices. On one occasion, after reading that passage in the Ephesians (vi. 12) which relates to the conflict of the saints with the powers of darkness, he said, excitedly, "This conflict is going on here to-night. The evil spirits are here in this meeting now. I see them, feel them." On another occasion he narrated a recent experience of his at his home chapel at Loughor. He and a few friends were engaged in worship there, when suddenly they heard the sweet strains of a celestial choir wafted on the air. The singing was in Welsh, and the words were "Jesus is coming." He took this as a hint to start on his second mission. To some all this will sound as mere superstition, and I should hesitate to say No; but I would suggest that Scripture seems saturated with much of the same sort, and before joining in the condemnation I should like to know what such men as Crookes, Wallace, and Sir Oliver Lodge would say to it.

I have nearly exhausted my space, and must hurry to a conclusion, leaving particulars to be dealt with on a future occasion. The Revival has not left a great impression on any of our churches. Gellyonen and Llandyssil have, perhaps, benefited most. In some districts the opposition on the part of the orthodox has been persistently bitter. On the whole, however, we have been plodding along, holding our own more or less successfully.

The "housing question," which has demanded much attention of late, is now practically settled, but it has entailed a legacy of debt which it will take some time to liquidate. The two societies—the Welsh and English—are helping bravely. The Musical Societies maintain their interest. Much is expected from the Temperance Society founded last summer. Our quarterly meetings continue popular, as is manifest from the large attendances. Yr Ymofynydd—the Welsh INQUIRER—is increasing its circulation, and forging its way into quarters where no Unitarian minister would be allowed to put his foot. The Hibbert Journal, also, though telling its story in a foreign tongue, finds its way into many an unexpected quarter.

The saddest feature in our present outlook is contained in the fact that so many of our ministers are being lured away by the richer pastures found elsewhere.

R. J. JONES.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Boston.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. W. Stoddart, preached a sermon in Spain Lane Chapel, on "Religion and Politics," in which he pleaded for the application of the principles of religious justice and righteousness to the policy of the nation. At the conclusion of the discourse, Mr. Stoddart invited Ald. Wm. Bedford, J.P., to express his views on the subject which he did, and mentioned that the gentleman whom he had brought with him was Mr. Hurst Holliwell. On hearing this Mr. Stoddart invited the well-known opponent of clerical intolerance in the schools to give them a few words. Mr. Hurst Holliwell, expressed his full concurrence with the discourse, especially with the distinction, so strongly drawn between religion, which is righteousness, and ecclesiastical systems. The priests had ever been the opponents of spiritual religion, and the bishops and archbishops of the State Church in Christ's day had conspired together and put to death the Prophet of Nazareth.

Brighton.—A Reading Circle and a Glee Society have just been formed in connection with the church, and the Ladies' Working Party, which lapsed for awhile, has been successfully re-established, and now meets regularly on Tuesday afternoons. The boys of the elder classes in the Sunday school have formed a Football Club. Among the week-night events of the past autumn have been two very sociable "socials," and a lecture by the Rev. Priestley Prime, on "Garden City," which attracted a full audience, including many strangers, to the newly decorated Lecture Hall. There has been an increase in the attendances at Sunday evening services.

Hinckley.—The Young Women's Bible Class in connection with the Great Meeting (conducted by Mrs. Jenkins, wife of the minister, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins) held a very successful tea and social gathering on Saturday, Dec. 16. Prizes for regular attendance were distributed by Mr. Hugh Atkins, and a pleasant incident of the evening was a presentation, by Mr. Atkins on behalf of the members of the class, of a very pretty tea service to Mrs. Jenkins.—A generous Christmas benefaction, to be distributed in perpetuity to the deserving poor and aged women of Hinckley, has been arranged for by a gift from Mr. Thomas Atkins, of the well-known hosiery firm, Atkins Brothers, long established in the town. Mr. Atkins is calling his fund the "Elizabeth Atkins Fund" in memory of his mother, who lived to an advanced age, and who was, like himself, one of the most loyal and active of the congregation of the Great Meeting. The fund is to be administered by three trustees, at the head of whom is to be the minister of the Great Meeting for the time being. Sixty women are to receive half a sovereign each at Christmas, attendants at the chapel to have the prior claim.

London: Laymen's Club.—A very successful smoking concert was held at the Inns of Court Hotel on Friday, December 15. The President, Mr. H. B. Lawford, occupied the chair, and there was a large attendance of members and friends. An excellent programme (arranged by Mr. A. Savage Cooper, W. H. Coltart and F. Dimmock) was contributed to by Messrs. F. L. Sargent, A. S. Cooper, Frank Iorsen, G. W. Howard, Charles Mooney, S. T. Lock, and Madame Hastings Warren. During the evening, the President performed a novel conjuring trick in the unavoidable absence of the conjuror on the programme, by taking the hat round and drawing silver from the members' pockets for a Christmas Box for the Missions. By this means £6 was collected, and divided equally among the missions at Bell-street, Rhyl-street, and George's-row.

Manchester: Moss Side (Appointment).—The Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, B.A., of Glossop, has accepted the invitation of the members of the Moss Side Unitarian Church, Shrewsbury-street, to become their minister, and will begin his duties on April 8, 1906.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The Rev. C. Peach has just concluded a course of six Sunday evening lectures on "The Moral System of Shakespeare." The lectures, which were well attended, treated of "The Supernatural Element in Shakespeare"; "The Inner and Outer Worlds," "Innocence and Pathos"; "Momentum of Character," "Realm of Tragedy," "Wrong and Restoration."

Middlesbrough.—A sale of work, organised by the Church Guild, to help to pay for the new system of ventilation and the electric light recently installed in the church, was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday, Dec. 13, and opened by Lady Bell, who was accompanied by Sir Hugh Bell. The sale was very successful, as was also the "At Home" of the Guild, held on the following evening.

Norwich.—The Rev. Alfred Hall concluded a series of sermons on "Unitarianism" at the Octagon Chapel, on Sunday last. The attendance was larger than it has been at the services for several years, the average being 300 persons. The strangers, who formed a great part of the congregations, were chiefly men, and the interest aroused has been considerable.

Scarborough.—A social gathering was held in the schoolroom on Friday evening, December 15, when there was a good attendance to meet the Revs. John Ellis and A. H. Dolphin, District minister and secretary respectively of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Both these gentlemen gave addresses on the work of the Union, urging its claims on the churches in the county, and laying stress on the necessity of realising their responsibilities and privileges as members of one corporate body.

South Cheshire and District Association of Sunday-schools and Congregations.—The winter meeting was held at Nantwich, on Wednesday, December 13. The President, the Rev. C. D. Badland, took the chair, and a paper read by Mr. Stanley J. Davis, on "Counter Attractions to Public-houses" provoked a well-sustained discussion. After tea, in the schoolroom, cordial votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Davis for his paper, and to the Rev. H. E. Haycock (who is leaving the district) for his past services as secretary. A religious service was afterwards held in the chapel, conducted by Mr. Haycock. The collection for the funds of the Association realised 13s. 5d. Mr. A. Orrett is acting as secretary pro tem. as well as treasurer.

THE new volume of the Welsh series, Cyfres y Fil, edited by Mr. Owen M. Edwards, M.A., of Lincoln College, Oxford, is a selection in prose and verse from the writings of the late Rev. W. Thomas, M.A. (Gwilym Marles), of Llandyssul, who, with his congregation, was evicted from the old Llwynrhydowen chapel on political grounds in 1876. The selection, which is non-political and uncontroversial in character, is made with great taste, and is a welcome tribute to the memory of a man who did fine work in his day. Cyfres y Fil means, we understand, "The Thousand Series," with reference to the circulation of the publication. The new volume is the fourteenth of the series, which began with selections from Dafydd ab Gwilym, a contemporary of Chaucer's. The price of the little volumes, which circulate largely among young people, is 1s. 6d. The publishers are Jones Bros., Conway, N. Wales.

C. & B.'s "Art Metal" 1/- Box of Butter-Scotch may now be obtained. Address of nearest agent on receipt of post-card. Manufactory, London, W.C.

Appeal for New Subscribers.

THE committee confidently appeal to friends to assist them in maintaining the above Institution. Consequent upon the death of many old Subscribers the funds necessary for carrying on the important mission work in this district have become all too little, and to avoid annual special appeals it is necessary to have the subscription list increased. A subscription of any amount would be gladly welcomed and entities to membership of the Institution. The following generous response has already been made:—

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ONCE more, on the eve of a New Year, to all friends who will accept it, a word of affectionate greeting and earnest wishes for the coming time, for strength and the quietness and confidence of faith, a happiness independent of the vicissitudes of time, and the truest satisfaction of faithful work!

IN our present issue will be found a translation of the sermon preached by the Rev. Charles Wagner in the Cathedral Church of Geneva, on the Sunday morning following the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, in which he had taken so cordial a part.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will preach at Rosslyn-Hill chapel, Hampstead, both morning and evening to-morrow (Sunday), and again in the evening of January 7, but not on the following Sunday, as had been at first expected. Service is at 11.15 and 6.30.

OUR programme for the New Year is not greatly elaborated, and we announce simply some series of special articles, confident that the general features and aims of THE INQUIRER are well known. But we would say here a special word about church news to the members of our own community. We are anxious that the columns of "News from the Churches" should be better filled with matter really of general interest, and we would appeal especially to members of active churches and societies, where any new departure is made or new method of helpful work tried, to let us hear of it, that good example may kindle emulation, and really admirable work that is going on may be known to all. Too often little things of little consequence are reported (e.g. the names of those who preside over urns at tea-parties or provide flowers for decorations), while active workers in really valuable enterprise are perhaps too busy, perhaps too modest, to send any report of their doings. But in every congregation that is alive there ought to be some sympathetic reporter who will take care that "the light shall shine" for our common instruction and encouragement.

ONE thing more. We shall be grateful to reporters of church news, if they will remember that they are reporting impersonally to the public, and will write the news notes as far as possible in a form in which they can be published. And if a Saturday's paper, with news perhaps nearly a week old, is sent up, let it arrive on Monday, not on Thursday. If six such papers arrive on Thursday, it is impossible for the editor to do justice to the news. Far more helpful is the note written by those on the spot, who have the fullest knowledge.

MR. JOHN BURNS, President of the Local Government Board, "the standard-bearer of the rude mechanicals," had a splendid reception at Battersea on Wednesday, in opening his election campaign. Punch had a fine cartoon the other day of the Cabinet Minister who is still a genuine working man. There is no doubt that he will work, and work, as we believe, in the best interests of the people whom he knows so well. Not the loafer who shirked, but the genuine labourer who worked, he said, would have his sympathy. The poor and oppressed would have his ear, but the plausible cadger never. His idea was fewer workhouses, and more homes, smaller charities and larger wages, more pleasure and less drink, smaller cities and larger villages. That would be his ideal. "Slow and solid administrative work" at the "permanent organic changes in society" would be his method, careful, while helping the poor, not to endow poverty. "They must sympathise with the weak, but they must not stereotype the causes which made them weak."

WAS the Editor of the Sunday Magazine very hard put to it to find some exciting fiction for his pages, or is it sheer perversity, which has led him to republish that silly, sensational story "When it was Dark" in "carefully abridged" monthly parts? The Bishop of London astonished people who had looked into this worthless book by his public commendation of it, and now the Sunday Magazine advertises it as "the greatest serial we have published." It furnishes in the new number a portrait of the author—not a very intelligent face—and informs us that he lives "in an ancient granite manor in the wild hinterland of the grey Duchy of Cornwall." He is described as "an old Oxford man who has had a varied journalistic experience." Thus it appears (though still, judging from the portrait, a young man) that he is not a rabid curate, as has been supposed.

THE Christmas number of the Sunday Magazine has an illustrated article on Mr. George Tinworth, as an "Evangelist in Clay," and gives among the illustrations one of the group in Whitworth Park, Manchester, of "Christ Blessing the Children," to which we referred last week as pictured in the Christian Endeavour and S.S.U. calendars. The editor who republishes "When it was Dark" will, perhaps, be astonished to hear that this beautiful work was produced by Mr. Tinworth from the design and under the direction of a well-known Unitarian layman. Let him read of this in the Christian Endeavour Times of Nov. 30.

THE photographs of the Martineau and Armstrong memorials in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, advertised in last week's INQUIRER, will be welcome to many friends. That of the Martineau memorial is beautiful. The medallion portrait of Mr. Armstrong in the other will, we fear, be a grievous disappointment to those who knew him. Happily, in the new volume of his Memoir and sermons, there is a really beautiful portrait. The tablet, in which the white marble of the medallion is set in a dark background, has above the cornice the two kneeling figures symbolising "Praise" and "Prayer," also in white marble.

BEDFORD COLLEGE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—Her Majesty the Queen has graciously promised £100 towards the building fund now being raised on behalf of the above College. Mrs. Ludwig Mond has promised £1,000 and the Clothworkers' Company will contribute £250 when £25,000 has been collected and a second £250 when the fund reaches £50,000. These promises have been received since the publication of the preliminary list. Her Majesty allows her name to head a special list of £100 donations, to which the Right Honourable Arthur and Mrs. Acland, Sir George Gibb, and the Right Honourable R. B. Haldane have already each promised £100.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

CONCERNING THE FEDERATION.

THE following is the document to which we referred in a brief note last week.

To the Ministers and Laity of the Unitarian Churches :—

It is known to all that a great meeting of delegates from various Christian bodies has just been held in New York City under the name of the Inter-church Conference on Federation. As all Christian bodies were invited to take part in this movement, we, the undersigned, were, in natural response and in fraternal good will, appointed as representatives of the free Christian churches called Unitarian. We were, however, refused admission to the meeting on the ground that Unitarians are not Christians. Our characters were not impeached, but our beliefs were condemned as heretical. In spite of the protest of a number of the most distinguished Christian scholars and leaders of other denominations than our own, this exclusion has now been confirmed by the action of the conference itself. The Unitarian churches are definitely omitted from the list of the Christian bodies entitled to representation in the "Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America."

We make no controversy over this action which puts, not us, but its promoters, at the bar of an enlightened public opinion. In view of it, however, it seems timely for us to affirm anew the simple truth, proclaimed of old by Christ himself, that righteousness of life and spiritual efficiency, rather than orthodoxy of belief, is the test of Christian discipleship. We affirm that the doing of the will of the Master is the vital thing, and that beliefs about the nature of Christ are unimportant in comparison with practical obedience to his precepts.

The Unitarian churches of America, and all who desire to promote pure Christianity in our land, should be glad to be confronted by a stimulating challenge. Whatsoever good things these other denominations propose to accomplish—and we deeply appreciate the good they do—it is manifest that, as represented by this action, they are both unwilling and unable to commit themselves to the great Christian principles of freedom and brotherhood. It is for us, therefore, to urge, with new insistency and in the spirit of universal fellowship, the ideals of faith and conduct that lie back of all the different theologies, and that breathe in the true worship of all the churches, and to teach that under the inspiration of the life of Christ men may here and now enter into his high discipleship in honest and unselfish service of the present age.

We therefore appeal to all liberal Christians to put fresh courage and patient devotion into their own significant work. Let us each and all believe more stoutly than ever in our mission to mankind and go to work for it with heart and head and hand. We certainly shall not try to build higher the barriers which seem to stand between us and our brethren of other Christian communions. God forbid that any among us should make that sad mistake. We are called upon to recognise that our distinctive message, which we believe to be and strive to make the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ, is still needed in all parts of the world. By fearlessly proclaiming the ideals of a simple and rational Christian faith and of spiritual high-mindedness, by living lives of public-spirited service and wide-spread charity, by increasing the power and usefulness of our liberal churches and upbuilding our institutions, we shall help to keep in Christian discipleship those who have been alienated from all religious connections, and best promote the cause of truth, freedom, and righteousness.

When the good time comes that our brethren in other Christian denominations know us better, they will find us ready most cordially to co-operate with them and with all other religious bodies in establishing the kingdom of God on the earth.

A LAND OF CHRISTMAS TREES.

THE forest ways are miry with alternate frost and thaw, the birds are flown, the hum of insect life is hushed. The fir trees are here, and amidst their slender, dark, unending rows of stems, run the same paths which in summer time past, so many holiday feet have pressed. How we have sighed with sheer delight as we passed from out the fierce glow of a mid-day sun, into the cathedral stillness of the pine woods, bathed ourselves in the strong fragrant incense that ever thence arises. How often, it must be remembered, have we moved along these shadowy ways until the monotony has begun to oppress the mind, and we have questioned the need of this innumerous repetition of one of nature's simplest patterns. But the summer is long ended, and, as we are very conscious, the ways are soft and miry. Without, the light of a December sun is pale, and within the gloom is deep. This is the land of fairy story, and to-day it seems given up to fairy folk, for of human presence there is little sign, and so we surrender ourselves to the fascination of fondly-fancied, half-believed superstitions. One really might in yonder hollow of the hills meet with the "little people." For the path runs now down hill, and across the tree-tops are glimpses of yet other hills and other woods beyond. And then in a moment we step out into a clearing. There lie the young fir trees, which the woodman has felled. It is the first preparation for the festival of the children, and gives answer to our wonder why the pine woods are so broad and long.

We leave the woods and enter the town. Along the country road we pass long, creaking wains of primitive shape and construction, piled high with the load of what by this time we must call its Christmas trees. And so the annual invasion of the little towns and the great cities of Germany begins. Here is Leipzig for example, a place of wide streets, of splendid, even though also of somewhat monotonous buildings, above all, of broad open spaces. Everywhere are the Christmas trees. The great squares are improvised forests where you walk through avenues of trees, the while you breathe deep breaths of the freshened fragrant air. Here are trees no taller than a five-year maiden; there others which will find their place in the coloured dimness of lofty church chancels, and there, adorned with candle lights and shining tinsel, will overtop the high altar itself. So intimately does the Christmas tree touch every range of life. We find them thus in the churches; in the theatre the dancers bear little Christmas trees as they dance. The man in the newspaper office must write thereof; the preacher's word must be of these plants of paradise in German homes. Let us for a while wander yet through the city. At all hours in all directions, people are carrying away their tree. In this, all sorts and conditions of men are one. The very tram platforms are green bosky places. And here two little children, boy and girl, march importantly along, bearing a tree far longer than their joint stature (true, an elder supports part of the weight, but it is the children who feel the pride of possession most). Come back into the great square. For all the trees that are taken hence, ever, as if by magic, new forests rise. And in the forest midst, we pause where the men of the woodlands get their hot coffee in canvas tents, all open to the air. So the days pass by. So the trees pass one by one to every home and institute, so still the unthinned pine wood rises in the city, and flings its rich scent all round.

Of these many Christmas trees we can follow the history of but few. For the rest imagination must serve us. Here are eight trees. The scene is the city orphan-house. In an upper room, quite charming in its wall decoration we find five of the trees full of lights and ornaments, but without any presents thereon. At the foot of the trees are figured representations of the Adoration of the Kings, of the Birth in the shed, and the worship of the simple country folk. Enter the children, all preternaturally good, as is the way of children on these occasions; here also grave members of the City Council. For is not the city itself a father! And right magnificently to-day it plays the part of the good-hearted parent at the festal season. Now rises the Christmas song, which is ringing through the land just now,

"O du fröhliche, o du selige gnadenbringende Weihnachtzeit!
Welt ging verloren, Christ ist geboren
Freue, freue dich, O Christenheit!"

Then with recitation, song and speech the ceremony comes to a close. And now the children's very own hour is come. Into separate rooms they troop, and in each room a Christmas tree. But still on them no presents. These are spread upon long tables, all the things in which children take delight are here, and here in no stinted measure rises now the sound of young voices, for, as is also the way with children the preternatural gravity falls gracefully away, as the child steps into undying fairyland of kindly given gifts. Right well to-day the City plays its part of Christmas-man. And, still, when the evening wears to it close, the Christmas trees remain untouched; with light and ornament they stand unspoilt to the last. Truly in the land of Christmas trees they understand how the symbolic Tree ought to be treated. From ancient times, whereunto the memory of man runneth not, right into the midst of the modern prose world, it abides as the tutelary deity of high romance.

SHOW US THE FATHER.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES WAGNER, OF PARIS.

"Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father."—ST. JOHN xiv. 8.

O THOU Eternal Source of mysteries and of truth, sanctify us by Thy word; Thy word is truth. Amen.

Dearly beloved brethren in Jesus.

"Show us the Father." It is a disciple who is speaking, but the question is a question of a novice, nay, almost of a child. And it is the Master who is answering. Let us examine, in succession, the question and the answer.

"Show us the Father." In uttering these words Philip was giving expression, unconsciously, to all the religious aspirations of mankind.

That great writer, Peter Rosegger, calls one of his books, "Der Gottsucher"—the "Seeker after God." When he wrote this title he graved the very name by which man might be denoted; man, that is, in his entirety, and shorn of none of the higher and characteristic faculties of his being. Man is a seeker after God.

In the very beginning, appealing to Nature, we exclaim, Show us the Father! And say what our thinkers and philosophers may against the error of seeking after God in material Nature, it remains none the less true that we cannot help beginning in that way. It is the very leading of wisdom; it is the path divinely marked out for us by which to proceed from the transient to the eternal.

If Christ said, "Consider the lilies of the field," and "behold the birds of the heaven," was he not persuaded that a gracious message was inscribed on the corolla of the lily of the field? Did he not feel that every sparrow that spreads its wings is as a dove from the ark sent to mankind, bearing its message, fragmentary, no doubt, but a message from Him who is hidden behind the veil of the material world.

We must estimate at its true value, therefore, this seeking after God in Nature. We must "drink of the tenderness and taste of the terror" of this creation that encompasses us, one while smiling upon us like a mother, one while overawing us like a monster. But however sweet it is for us to find some trace of the Eternal Father on the sands of our life's shore; however fascinating the experience may be of fleeing from the tumultuous haunts and feverish society of men, to seek on the mountain side, in solitude and calm retreat, the presence of God; none the less is it true that there has ever been an ancient and gigantic struggle between the living soul of man and eternal Nature. If Nature at times is so transparent as hardly to veil the face of the Father, at other times she assumes the guise of a dark and deadly wall, against which we bruise our mind and heart. How can mankind ever grow reconciled to the offence of Nature's cruelties, or to her frightful unconcern, when, dumb, blind and deaf, she crushes under her heavy wheels myriads of lives, and becomes again a tomb in which man is buried with all his love, his reason, and his hope. Nature sums up her message for us after all in these words: "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Nature concludes in nothingness; but man has no right to subscribe to her nothingness, nor practise the resignation of withered leaves.

When I ponder over this Nature-God, over this God that day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night showeth knowledge; when I consider His majesty and His powerlessness to satisfy our souls, I call to remembrance a painful occurrence.

One night, away down in the neighbourhood of Brittany, a vessel foundered; with her went down almost the entire family of the poet Le Braz and of Léon Marillier, whom you here in Geneva knew so well. Of those who were in that vessel one only survived, but only to die slowly, long after the others—my friend Léon Marillier. I saw him on his dying bed, three days after the wreck, with that vision of horror still fresh in his memory. He told me how he painfully clung to an oar, hour after hour, floating between a calm and silent sea and the starry heavens. He described what he felt as he beheld the serenity of the stars, the smile of that night, that, like some fair creature adorned with a necklet of starry gems, moved over the billows, sublime, yet unconcerned for the helpless mortals struggling in the darkness. That day I realised once again that if the poet could sing:

"Étoiles, vos regards font tomber à genoux, L'appel de l'infini sous vos longs cils palpite"
("O stars, your eyes constrain our knees to bend, Beneath your rays deep throbs the voice of God"), it is none the less true that between man and Nature in her most marvellous forms there is a gulf that nothing can ever span. At the best, even when she displays her beauty and her sweetness in all their fulness, Nature is only the fringe of God's mantle. We must needs penetrate deeper, even to His heart.

II.

To furnish a way of escape from the cruel uncertainty attaching to our destiny, and to the purposes of the supreme Will that moves the world, as those purposes affect us, other messengers were required than trees and mountains, other lights than those shed on us from the stars. To render, in short, even remotely the features of the Father, far other colours were needed than those that sufficed for portraying the visible world.

Confronting the impenetrable firmament of the crystalline heavens, the ancient Prophet cried: "Oh that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down." That cry marks a new stage in the search for God. Let not the anthropomorphism of a prayer that urges the Deity to dwell with us be a stumbling-block to you. That prayer, in a form most appropriate to our weakness, expresses none the less the fundamental law of all human contact with reality. Surely nothing belongs to us but what is adaptable to our nature. All things take on something human as they pass through the soul of man. The rocks you see on the horizon, the light you contemplate, acquire human characteristics as you gaze upon them. God, too, must needs become man to be comprehended by men. Everything is comprised in this truth: The spot where God is nearest to us is a human soul animated by His spirit. As human beings we are caged, though free, in the confines of our destiny, restricted within the limits of our knowledge, and the Deity can only become accessible to us and assimilable by us as He interprets Himself in terms familiar to us. It is no abasement in God to come down to us. It is an added grandeur. He alone can both dwell in light inaccessible and draw nigh to a contrite heart.

The truth, then, that Christ proclaimed in his great reply to the disciple who desired to see the Father, was a truth not of an age or of a single race, but for all time: "What else have I been doing, since I sojourned amongst you, but showing you the Father? Behold me, Philip! By reason of the mysterious grace given unto me, I am become the legible transcription for mankind of the impenetrable hieroglyphics of the invisible reality. Behold me! Through my eyes the Father smiles upon thee, judges thee, and forgives thy sins! Through my heart the Father sends thee His message of love; by my words He calls thee, and by my hand He holds thee."

Think not, my brethren, that there is in this declaration of Jesus any outrageous or blasphemous exaggeration of an "ego" limited, after all, to his own personality. No, there are two ways of expressing the "ego." In one we include all that is impure, selfish, and, at the same time, exclusive and strictly individual in our nature, the epitome of a soul contentious and desirous of lonely isolation. It is the lower self. But there is a higher self expressing that which brings us near to our brethren, that which the Father has given us, that which in us is divine. It is of this self that Jesus spoke when he said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." Never did he aspire to an exclusive and jealous royalty, by right of which he would dominate his brethren, and let their abasement be the measure of his exaltation. He has ever joined himself to others, identifying himself with a higher humanity in the close solidarity of a body of which all are members one of another and Christ the head. In his impersonal self are gathered the influences from above and the aspirations of men, as in the vigorous vine-stock are concentrated all the roots that come from the earth and all the branches which stretch upwards to the heavens. The mysterious line of the horizon, where sky and ocean join in such a way as to leave us uncertain at times whether what we see is the blue of the seas or the blue of the sky, symbolises admirably His nature. God and man have met in him: God hath visited His people. We have beheld a human God, a divine humanity.

Before this revelation of a new kind have vanished the former and lower images under which mankind feared and worshipped God. The jealous and cruel Powers have sunk into the shade. The stars have paled of those Olympian deities who joyfully quaffed their ambrosia, sitting in eternal light, whilst mankind in their twilight wept and toiled. A suffering and militant God, a God toiling in our mortal frame, weeping with our tears, mingling in our struggles, pitying our sins and miseries, a God who is close to us when we make our bed in the grave, that it may be less dark—this is the Father who has appeared to us reflected in the soul of Jesus, as the azure dome is reflected in a limpid stream.

* A Sermon preached in the Church of St. Peter, Geneva, on Sunday, Sept. 3, 1905, being the Sunday after the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. Translated by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A.

III.

Yet, my brethren, whatever be the scope and depth of this truth, we will not let it detain us longer now. Let us rather hasten to practical conclusions, after the example given to us by the Master. Christ always advanced to action. We must not loiter to unfold mystic wings under the infinite vault of heaven, nor to speak of the loftiest and holiest and most life-giving realities. We must drink of the water of life and partake of the bread of life and do the will of the Father.

In the revelation of God to men a third stage remains to be completed—and the most important, for it affects the question of our personal responsibility. When Christ made his declaration to Philip, he added, "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do." What else does that mean than that we, too, are called "to show the Father"?

Alas! before describing in what a luminous fashion even the weakest and the least among us could show the Father, we needs must depict a dark background to so luminous a picture.

Man is capable of collaborating in two series of revelations—the light series and the dark series. We can all be heralds of the night or heralds of the day.

Men, by their evil actions, have filled the earth with gloom. Every morning, when we begin anew our work, we can be workers of iniquity, makers of darkness, sowers of gloom.

If you dispute with one another, even about the highest things—about things that concern religion, for example—you veil the face of the Father. If you exclude each other and excommunicate one another, sinning against brotherhood, you veil the face of the Father. If, rejoicing selfishly in your wealth and in your health, or in your very virtues, you imagine that the earth and all that therein is, has been granted in homage to you, as to kings, and you have no thought for your brethren who hunger and weep, go astray and are defiled, you veil the face of the Father.

"Quand les petits enfants, les mains de froid rougies
Ramassent sous vos pieds les miettes des orgies,
Les regards du Seigneur se détournent de vous."
("When little children's hands, all red with cold,
Snatch at the crumbs that from your feasts have rolled,
The eyes of Christ are turned away from you.")

Whenever you lie, whenever you act hypocritically, profanely, impurely, cowardly, whenever your heart is not with your lips, nor your hands in accord with your secret thought, you veil the Father.

Let us not, when we hear these things, apply them to others; let us apply them to ourselves, religious people or professedly such. If there is in the world such darkness of soul, such experiences of emptiness and despair, such a profound ignorance of God, where does the blame lie more than with the accredited champions of religion? For, if there are, as you often repeat—and rightly—if there are those exceptional atheists who, by their goodness, their simplicity, their uprightness, constrain us to believe in God, are there not, on the other hand, too many professed religious people who, by their perverse minds, their avaricious spirits, their mean trickeries, their sanctimonious prayers, their lying chants, make men doubt God? Nay, as the Apostle, in those terrible words, says, make men hate Him, "For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you."

Sometimes, when I am more particularly struck by this dark side of things, by all that man has done to cast a shade over the Father's face, by all those traces of impurity that our lips have left on the name hallowed by all, it seems to me that the Eternal cries: "Call me no more by my name; my name is too polluted. Under cover of my name, what iniquities are done in the earth! Sit in silence, in sackcloth and ashes, and be ye kind, simple, true. Be men, be brothers. In poverty and misfortune, be helpers one of another; whatever gift or wealth you may have, employ it for the service of others. Ye honour me too much with your lips; be still, and manifest your love in silence. Then will I appear in the silence where I love to dwell; I will appear in your poverty, for it is mine to be rich in poverty. Even in the dark cross-roads of doubt, when ye no longer know how to seek me and find me, if ye will join hands in brotherly helpfulness I shall be in the midst of you, more surely than when ye multiply the vain ceremonies of a worship which your actions belie."

That we may be, by our acts, messengers of the Father is a truth that is from time to time brought home to us in a most striking way.

The week that has just closed had opened once again on the vast scandal of bloodshed, which for so long was desolating the East, and, bit by bit, had been spreading its sinister gleams over the whole horizon of the civilised world. To-day is the first Sunday we meet for worship after the war was brought to an end by the courage of one man, of a man who is better than President of a great Republic—a child of God in simplicity and in truth. When the step he was taking was known, it struck us all by its boldness. Such was the magnitude of the obstacles, that they appeared insurmountable. For many a day the superhuman struggle fluctuated, leaving us in suspense between hope and fear. But at length the smiling light of peace shone on us. The impossible had been realised.

Did it not seem to you, that day, that the Sublime Unknown, the Father, whom no man can express nor comprehend, had moved amongst us and acted through the instrumentality of a man of good will? When the bells of Portsmouth clanged out, and, across the continent of America and throughout the civilised world, the Hosannah of Peace vibrated, did you not feel as if the realisation of a fairer future was being heralded through the air? At such times we grasp the significance of the prophecy of Jesus: "The works that I do shall ye do also; and greater works than these shall ye do." "If ye believe in God, believe also in me." To believe in Christ is to believe in God-in-man, and consequently to believe also in ourselves and in what God is able to do through us. For we are pledged for the honour of God. A high and holy humanity will one day be the justification of the Creator of the world.

Let us believe, then, in our work, in our future, in the lowliest efforts of our hands, though no stronger than a child's; so shall we prove to the Eternal, who hath made us, that we believe in Him. Whoever sees not God in man will see Him nowhere. He who believes not in humanity, in the dark furrow in which we sow our life, and from which we shall gather fruits of immortality, destroys by this fundamental unbelief the basis on which the moral universe and faith itself in God is reared. The religious pessimist who admits a distant future, when all evil shall be redressed, but who believes not in man, nor believes that God will end by purifying this world and fulfilling His Will, such a pessimist, be he never so religious, disturbs the pillars on which securely rests faith in the living God. A positive check to human effort would be tantamount to a divine defeat.

Let us listen once again to Christ—"If ye believe in God, believe also in me"—and by our faith in him let us establish our faith in ourselves. Let no man tax with pride what is the true doctrine of salvation and of every action of redemption.

Did not Jesus say, "I am the vine, ye are the branches . . . . for without me ye can do nothing"? And all of us who strive to live in his spirit know to what degree the comparison is true. But then, why not apply it to ourselves in its fullest extent? Have you ever wondered what would become of the vine if it had no branches? The branches can do nothing without the vine; the vine can do nothing without the branches. To every child of man God himself says, "I have need of thee to manifest me amongst thy fellow-creatures; unto that end have I called thee by thy name. Be eyes for me to look on pain; be hands for me to touch the wanderers and bring them back; and, in proportion as thou revealest my holy will through thy deeds, thou, too, shalt see me."

This, then, dear brethren, comrades in trial and hope, is what I, like one of yourselves, have desired to set forth this morning, in the midst of your sympathetic silence, happy to be privileged once again to raise my voice in this good old town of Geneva, where I have ever met with so much fraternal sympathy. What gladder tidings could I have proclaimed to a band of poor fellow-sinners, but sinners each of whom represents a hope of God, and whom Christ found worthy to die for? May the most stricken amongst us, the most tried by suffering; may he who often believes himself to be forgotten, and for whom the Father's face seems veiled; may such an one once again lift up his head and deepen his trust in the presence of such realities. May he leave this house of prayer with his heart warmed by closer touch with the Father's heart. I could wish that, penetrated and strengthened by the mighty virtue contained in the words "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," we should never again lose courage in any circumstance of life, even the most desperate, and that the promise of Jesus should be fulfilled in us: "He who believeth on me, from within him shall flow rivers of living water." Amen.

LITERATURE.

MR. MALLOCK'S present work is less entertaining, but more solid and permanently valuable, than the brilliant "New Republic," which made him a literary celebrity. Its purpose is to re-establish on a substantial basis the religious faith which recent science has so largely undermined. This reconstruction of belief will, in Mr. Mallock's view, not come about by the usual modes of attacking that scientific monism, which the writings of Spencer, and more recently of Haeckel, have made so extensively popular. Mr. Mallock's fundamental difference from the current modes of defending religion is thus expounded:—"Stated briefly, what happens is this. The scientific explanation of existence conflicts with the religious explanation, because it exhibits existence as a single necessary process, man being a momentary product of it, God being the process as a whole, and no personal relation between these two being possible. Such being the explanation which our apologists are pledged to invalidate, they seek to invalidate it in one or other of two ways which we may call respectively the clerical way and the philosophic. The clerical way is to scrutinise science in detail, with a view to showing that the process which science represents as automatic would break down at this point or that, if it were not for the help and interference of a living power external to it. The philosophic way, which is now growing in popularity, is to accept the scientific explanation as complete within its own limits, but to reduce it to insignificance by reason of a system of idealism, according to which, the entire subject-matter of science—namely, the physical universe, our own brains included—is a dream which owes its existence to our own immortal minds."

The way in which this idealism professes to get rid of the apparent antagonism between science and religion is thus graphically depicted:—"Does science detect in the universe unbroken determinism? What matter? This is not a determinism which the universe is imposing on us, but a determinism which we who are determined by ourselves only, have imposed on it. Do the various phenomena of the universe—our own bodies especially—seem to dissolve and fade and pass away irrevocably? What matter? Our bodies are created by our minds. The created appearance disappears; the creator still persists. Thus, says, Professor Ward, by the aid of a true philosophy, man learns to recognise himself as a spirit in a world of spirits; and from a world of free spirits with the universe as their humble pensioner, the passage, he proceeds, to the 'Supreme Spirit' is easy." We believe Mr. Mallock was a Balliol student; if so, it is strange that he shows himself so wholly inappreciative of idealism, whether of the Berkeleian or the Hegelian stamp. Instead of critically examining these theories, he simply tries to show that the theory of the cosmos enunciated by the evolutionists, absorbs into itself all that is true in these idealisms; and that what it cannot absorb is thereby shown to be erroneous. We are told by Mr. Mallock that the idealist's doctrine of the inseparability of the thinker and the objective world is now superseded by the scientific doctrine that the same universe is the extended body of each man and of all men; that "when science has been rationalised by philosophy, the external universe is for each separate mind more truly a part of it than it is said to be by the boldest idealist, and is also as completely independent of all individual minds as it is said to be by the most commonsense realist." Again, our author maintains that the human soul cannot be an entity which is the source of its own activity, because science has shown it to be "a highly composite product having in itself the workmanship of a hundred million years, rooted in the universe it confronts, and drawing from this its daily nutriment." And when personal idealists such as Professor Ward declare that the self exerts conation, the reply of science is that every element in nature, including the ultimate constituents of the brain, which is the physical side of the mind, is in a state of constant conation and movement.

The human self, according to the evolutionary theory which Mr. Mallock espouses, is not a single spiritual monad or entity which may be conceived as acting separately, but is simply the sentient and conscious side of a complex organism of which the physical side is formed by the countless atoms of the cerebral structure. Having thus expounded the theory of the cosmos, which he thinks recent science has established, our author, at the close of the first of the four books which constitute the volume, admits that when recent science has said its say, "the universe remains rigid and unresponsive to man—the process of a Something which, when seen to be of the nature of mind, is no less mechanical in its behaviour than it appears to be under the guise of matter. Man remains, in spite of his derived activity, nothing more than a passing and passive mode of it, and the Whole, or God, if we like to use that name, becomes more remote and more hopelessly inaccessible than ever."

So far, then, as science is concerned, the cause of religion appears to be desperate; and Mr. Mallock thinks that he has shown that neither the clerical nor the philosophic method avails to rescue it from this grievous strait. He has, however, a method of his own, which he proceeds to expound in this second book, and to confirm and complete in the last two books. The second book is by far the most interesting and valuable feature in the work; but the reasons given there in support of religious belief may be, and, indeed, sometimes are, urged also by the clerics and the philosophers in confirmation of their theistic conclusions.

The ground taken by Mr. Mallock is that the scientific account of the universe is evidently defective, for though it may satisfy man considered as a mere student of science, it does not satisfy man as a whole, seeing that it fails to recognise and to explain the motive powers which have been most effective in raising the human race to its present civilised condition. It becomes evident, accordingly, that the scientific verdict must be greatly qualified and supplemented from other sources. Mr. Mallock points out with great lucidity and force that religious belief has been an essential and most potent causal factor in elevating the social life of humanity. The progress of the human race, he maintains, could not possibly have taken place had not men assumed and believed in three great realities, viz.: the Freedom of the Will, the Goodness of God, and the prospect of Personal Immortality. He first takes the case of Moral Freedom, and shows that all reverence for heroism, all the confidence and delight of true love, all the divine significance of forgiveness, turn upon the belief in conduct, "which originates in the man's conscious self, and which he has deliberately chosen when he might just as well have chosen its opposite."

This belief in Free-will can hardly fail to start a question to which this volume gives, we think, a most unsatisfactory answer. Mr. Mallock admits that this belief shows that the self of man is to some extent separated from, and can act independently of, its cosmical surroundings. Why, then, the reader naturally asks, if your moral consciousness asserts the existence of a freedom which the cosmology of Haeckel declares to be non-existent and impossible, do you not recognise that there is something fundamentally wrong in Haeckel's account of the matter, and adopt instead, a cosmology such as Lotze's or Martineau's, which represents all monads as having a certain individuality or self-hood which, in the case of the human soul, rises to the possession of a measure of free-choice? Instead of taking this course, Mr. Mallock prefers to say in effect, Haeckel's account of the matter is scientifically correct, and the moral consciousness is also correct in asserting freedom. No doubt, he says, we here encounter a contradiction, but, according to Herbert Spencer and Mansel, all our fundamental ideas, such as those of space, matter, motion, causation, &c., involve self-contradictory ideas. To many philosophers, however, this alleged fundamental self-contradiction has no existence. They hold that there is much in our thoughts and beliefs that transcends the comprehension of our understanding; but in this they see nothing which involves sheer self-contradiction or paralyses faith in the ultimate rationality of the universe. It is unfortunate that Mr. Mallock seems to recognise the influence of no philosophy save the idealistic, and since this philosophy appears to him quite untenable, as being entirely inconsistent with our present scientific knowledge, he prematurely concludes that all existing philosophic defences of moral freedom and religious faith lack validity.

There is much in this very suggestive volume which all theists will find strongly confirmative of their ethical and religious ideas. Most of them, however, will, we believe, leave Mr. Mallock to harmonise to his own satisfaction the discord between his firm faith in Haeckel's cosmology and his equally firm faith that the beliefs in Freedom, God, and Immortality are well founded; but they will welcome as most valuable his able contention that a belief in genuine moral freedom has been, and is, a condition of all permanent social welfare and progress.

* "The Reconstruction of Belief." By W. H. Mallock. (Chapman & Hall, 1905, pp. xii, 313. 12s. net.)

Equally interesting are the many pages in the second book, in which the author maintains with great acuteness and power, that mental civilisation has always been essentially associated with a belief in a conscious principle as the ground and cause of the universe. "The God of modern religion," says Mr. Mallock, "whatever He may be else, is a synonym for that in which all aspirations are realised; in which intellect answers to intellect, in which heart answers to heart; in which every vague desire for a something we know not what—for something which, as Plato says, 'we augur but cannot see'—finds its proper object and is at rest." He then proceeds to argue that this religion is more or less implicitly involved in the writings of the chief agnostics. The savant who is regarded by many as the arch-materialist of the day, viz., Professor Haeckel, asserts as clearly as the most mystical Christian, that the chief elevating influences in the mind of man resolve themselves into an appreciation of three things—the true, the good, and the beautiful. Believing himself in no God, he calls these "the three goddesses"; and declares that the life of civilised and cultured men would cease to be civilised, would cease to have any value if it were not constantly lifting itself towards these three ideal ends. Beginning with the first of these goddesses, Mr. Mallock carefully analyses the passion for scientific truth, and reaches the conclusion that this passion would not be sustained did not the great scientists sub-consciously attribute to the universe in its totality the precise quality which their conscious logic denies to it. "Without," he says, "a belief that the universe is identified with a Power who is consciously responsive to our own personal consciousness, science, with truth for truth's sake as its object, would cease to exist, having lost all possible meaning, though it would remain the employee of medicine, commerce, and manufacture. And what holds good of truth as valued and pursued by science, holds good of truth for its own sake, let us look for it where we will."

And when, from the idea of truth we pass to the ideas of goodness and beauty, we shall find, he contends, that they, too, lose their essential character if disassociated from the idea of a conscious spirit of the universe. Though the conception of the summum bonum differs greatly with different men and with different stages of civilisation, it is, nevertheless, the fact that with all these varying conceptions there always goes the belief that there is an element in them which is not only valuable relatively to individual men, but is also good in some absolute and objective way. "But, if such a thing as absolute Goodness exists, it must resemble Goodness of the relative and contingent kind thus far, that it can only be Goodness at all by being Goodness for a conscious mind of some sort, and if it is to be absolute in any intelligible sense, and not contingent on the tastes of individual men it must be absolute because it is Good for some conscious Mind that is absolute, all-comprehending, self-existent, eternal—a Mind whose character transcends the character of man's, but with which by willing the Good man can put himself in connection."

The limits of our space do not allow us to follow Mr. Mallock in the defence of belief in personal immortality, which concludes the second book. We hope that we have said enough to show that the thoughtful theist will find this portion of Mr. Mallock's work very stimulating and helpful.

The most noteworthy features of the remaining books are first, a subtle argument to prove that even on scientific grounds there is reason to believe in a definite purpose dominating the whole course of cosmical evolution; second, an appeal to Haeckel's doctrine that all the elements of matter have a subjective or sub-conscious side in support of the belief that the basal principle of the cosmos is an eternal self-consciousness.

HARPER'S AMOS AND HOSEA.

THIS is a bewildering book. Amos and Hosea occupy some ten pages in an ordinary copy of our English Bible. Professor Harper's commentary extends over about six hundred pages, a large part of them in small print and crowded with references. The introduction has little direct connection with Amos or Hosea; it traces the whole history of religion in the Northern Kingdom, and indeed has something to say of Mosaic revelation from its very beginning. The endless subdivisions marked by numbers in brackets embarass instead of helping the reader, and sometimes ill-chosen phraseology increases the confusion. Surely for example "Pre-prophetism" is an unfortunate and clumsy title for religion as represented chiefly by the great prophet Elijah. Again, it is misleading to speak, as Professor Harper habitually does, of prophecies as "sermons." A sermon is due to natural, though this of course should include prayerful, preparation. It is delivered at a fixed hour, and, generally speaking, the arrangements made for the place and time of its delivery are by no means solely due to the preacher himself. There is a wide gulf between a discourse of this kind and "the word of the Lord" as it came to Amos or Hosea. The former was a shepherd in Southern Judah; he heard the voice of the Lord, and at its bidding he travelled northwards, not only to preach righteousness, but to announce the nation's impending doom. He had to speak the message directly communicated to him from above. "The Lord hath spoken: who will not prophesy?" No doubt, evil was done in a time not yet far distant, when prediction was regarded as the essential element of prophecy. It is, we think, an error no less fatal to forget that inspiration and reflection enter in very different proportions into Hebrew prophecy and the best of modern sermons, and that a modern preacher cannot, without unreality, lay claim to the prophetic office. Rather a good preacher is like a scribe instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, who brings forth from his treasure things new and old. We must add that Professor Harper often accumulates references with small profit on matters which are quite clear and mentions opinions now quite antiquated e.g., that Hebrew monotheism may have been drawn from Egyptian sources. The Pantheism of Egyptian priests presents no more than the most superficial resemblance to Mosaic monolatry, and it is on the face of it incredible that Moses adopted religious ideas from the Egyptian gods which Jehovah overcame. Apparently, Professor Harper's work was at first bulkier still, and was reduced to its present size by the publishers, who felt themselves unable to grant the space which would have been required. It is really hard to see what might not have been included in a commentary built on this plan. We may compare it to such a work as Professor Mayor's "Juvenal," which is also on a very large scale. But Professor Mayor's commentary is much more closely connected with the text, is far more distinguished in style, as well as much more interesting, and justifies itself by the fact that it is a work of original learning which contains a mass of illustration not to be found elsewhere.

At the same time, no fair-minded person will refuse to acknowledge gratefully that Professor Harper's commentary is by far the best which has appeared in English, though the English is disfigured by such an American vulgarism as "back of" this or that. Our whole attitude to the prophetic literature has changed within the last two decades. Twenty years ago the main questions on the origin of the Mosaic books had been practically settled, and it was supposed that in the prophetic literature we were at once on firm ground with little call for criticism. It was, of course, admitted that large parts of Isaiah and Zechariah were not the work of the prophets with whose authentic productions they have been united, and the early date once assigned to Joel was subjected to grave doubts. Questions had also arisen on the composition of Obadiah, and the origin of such a passage as Jeremiah li. Since then, doubts on the authenticity of the prophetic texts have become far more penetrating, and we can no longer accept even the words of Amos and Hosea as they stand without serious scrutiny. We shall take a few examples and consider them in the light of Professor Harper's book.

The later Scribes could not help being puzzled at the way in which Amos and Hosea ignore Judah. To the Scribes, Israel was a schismatic kingdom and Judah was the centre of true religion. Hence they interpolated passages to supply the deficiency. We find one of these at the very beginning of Amos, viz., in chapter ii. 4, 5. Professor Harper seems inclined to mark those verses as spurious, though he does not discuss the subject at length or give the real reason for rejecting them, viz., the vague and general charges made against Judah compared with the concrete and vivid character of the accusations made against Israel. The only other prophetic references to Judah in Amos are in i. 2, vi. 1, ix. 11; and of these the only important one is certainly spurious. It is disappointing to find that Professor Harper, who has much to say on irrelevant matters, does such scanty justice to those interesting verses. He does, however, in the introduction give a decided verdict against them, and admits that the references to Judah in Hosea are mostly from the hand of a later editor.

Next we have theological insertions in the style of second Isaiah, i.e., the implicit monotheism of the earlier prophets is made explicit and dogmatic by express assertions that Jehovah is the Creator and the only God. We have a good specimen of this in Amos v. 8, 9, a passage which severs the excellent connection between verses 7 and 10, and is quite commonplace in character. The last verse of Amos iv., also theological, has far higher literary merit.

We have another class of interpolations which may be classed as consolatory. Amos had a message of woe, and looked forward to the complete destruction of Israel as a nation. A scribe to whom this was inconceivable added ix. 8—15. The words imply that the Davidic dynasty had already fallen, and that Jerusalem was dismantled. There is more doubt about the last section of Hosea, which Professor Harper also dismisses as spurious. It can hardly be defended precisely in its present form. But Hosea's enduring love for his faithless wife does surely imply some purpose of divine mercy to faithless Israel; nor are we inclined to the heroic remedies which would reduce so highly an emotional writer to perfect consistency with himself.

Lastly, the metrical system of Hebrew poetry is now better understood than it was, and has become a powerful instrument for the emendation of the text. An account of the Hebrew metres, fair so far as it goes, is given in the introduction to the commentary before us. One or two points seem to be certain. The metre depends on accent, not on quantity. The lines are connected into periods consisting of two or more lines, while the periods are formed into strophes which treat of the same theme. Occasionally each strophe closes with the same refrain. But it is often very difficult to say where the one strophe begins and the other ends. Certainly the supposed laws of metre must be applied with great caution. Sometimes an emendation made on metrical grounds may be certain, but only, we think, when it is confirmed by other reasons. Such cases occur when the metre can be restored by omitting words which are evidently a prosaic gloss, or again by adding or omitting words in accordance with the text of the LXX. But the knowledge of Hebrew metre is still immature, and many years may pass before the strophic system can be taken as a secure basis for textual emendation.

ALL that we know, all that we revere, all that we adore—is the revelation of God through His incarnation in every human being.—Stopford A. Brooke.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.*

THIS book covers wide ground without adding anything that is new or striking on the many subjects that are referred to. But, for all that, it has its value, especially for ministers and for those who look forward to the ministry as their vocation, since it sets before them a high estimate of their calling, its responsibilities and privileges. The author starts with two very comprehensive definitions, by Henry Scougall (religion is "the life of God in the soul of man") and Max Müller ("religion consists in the perception of the Infinite under such manifestations as are able to influence the moral character of man"). Our readers will understand the writer's position when we say that from these large premises he evolves "what are commonly called the great cardinal doctrines of the evangelical faith, such as inspiration, incarnation, atonement, and regeneration."

As to the minister's peculiar work the following passage is interesting just now to many of our readers. "There are two things necessary to good government in a free commonwealth: the first is a diffused spirit of patriotism, justice, and goodwill; the second is the organisation of this spirit of patriotism, justice, and goodwill in laws and political institutions. It is the function of the lawyer, the statesman, the political reformer, to formulate the spirit of patriotism, justice, and goodwill in laws and institutions; it is the function of the minister to develop the spirit of patriotism, justice, and goodwill that it may be in the community to be formulated. . . . In the nature of the case, the statesman must be an opportunist, if he is to succeed; that is, he must consider the immediate effect of the present action. But we need other men in the community than opportunists. We need men with a long look ahead; men who are not considering what will be the immediate effect; men who consider what will be the ultimate effect of human action on the kingdom of God. Such is the minister. He is or should be an idealist. When an idealist goes into politics and undertakes to carry out his ideals in political action, he fails; when an opportunist goes into the pulpit and undertakes to measure human policies by immediate results, he fails."

The author makes a misrepresentation with regard to Dr. Martineau, which is inexcusable in one who quotes from the life by Dr. Drummond. He says, sans phrase that Martineau "always disavowed the name Unitarian." That, of course, is a gross blunder; for, while he repudiated the name (as well as every other doctrinal name) to designate his church, he freely accepted it to describe his belief on a question in theology. J. H.

WE hope to publish next week a New Year's sermon by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and it will be our privilege in the course of the year to publish a number of his holiday sermons, which he preached in Hope-street Church on his return from those voyages which were to him so great a delight, and visits to America, Norway, or other countries.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HAS this been a happy Christmas week for you? And what are the things you are most glad to remember? Are they not the acts of kindness you were able to do, the surprises of pleasure you brought to others, the light of happiness which you saw in other faces, when perhaps a parcel was opened with something in it you had made, or when you went into a lonely house to pay a surprise visit to one who has not many friends? If so, then I think you will understand what I said last week about angels.

An angel is a messenger of God, one who comes to us from Him, to tell us something about our lives and His will, which we must learn to do, because we are His children, and His will is always good. People in the old days imagined angels as beautiful winged creatures coming down out of the sky, to bring messages from God, and so they thought of the host of angels gathered round the simple shepherds, singing the song of joy when Jesus was born. But the real angels who sang for joy were the people whom Jesus afterwards helped, and who then went to tell others the good news. Then when their loving thoughts gathered about his cradle, they sang for joy of what he had brought to the world, and they imagined other angels in the sky, singing too.

Jesus brought new life to them, new gladness, liberty to the slave of selfishness, sight to the blind, who before had known of nothing but gross things in the world, and now saw the glory of God in the earth and the heavens, and in human faces about them. So they rejoiced and their joy became a song of thanksgiving, of glory to God and of peace and good will among men. And they became messengers of the good news to others, in very truth, angels of God.

But long before that, the baby Jesus had come as an angel, a messenger of God to his mother and father in their home at Nazareth; and they in turn to him, helping him to understand so perfectly what love means. There was no need to imagine other beings coming down to talk to him and tell him about God. He could learn it best in his own home. And that is what we have to learn now in exactly the same way. It is no use people telling us things about God, unless we feel it for ourselves. And we feel it best at home, not so much through words, as through the home feeling itself, where there is quietness and reverence and the gladness of trust, and father and mother and the children all together feel that they are with God, that He, the heavenly Father, is always there, and cares for them, and makes their life beautiful and strong in the knowledge of His love and of truth and right.

His angels are all about us, and they are the best and dearest angels who know and love us, and help us through their love to be good and to understand the perfect love of God. But I must tell you more about this another time.

This is the end of another year. Let us all take the Christmas happiness with us into the New Year. That, you know, we can do, through unselfishness, love, and trust.

LONDON, DECEMBER 30, 1905.

FROM OLD TO NEW.

WE are glad when New Year's Eve falls, as this year, on a Sunday. The quiet evening service at the habitual time, and then the gathering at home, would seem to be more wholesome and a better way of passing from the old to the new, than the watch-night service, impressive as that may be, at the actual mid-night hour. And certainly we shall be thankful, if the Sunday evening may this year spare us the hideous noises which so commonly in large towns, if not in the country, mar the quiet of the first moments of the New Year.

With thankful hearts we may pass onward to the coming year, not because of what has been achieved, but because there comes to us the fresh call of duty, in every relation of our life to "ring out the false, ring in the true." This nation is to be called immediately to the great endeavour of a General Election, to make a new beginning in the ordering of our common life. To whatever party we belong, let it be with the earnest aspiration after good citizenship, to make the common good in all things our paramount aim. And how better can we express the true ideal than in Tennyson's immortal words, consecrated in the hearts of the English people, always to be recalled on New Year's Eve, for the cleansing and uplifting of our lives, to set them right once more in every relation of duty and affection—

Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.

Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out my mournful rhymes,
But ring the fuller minstrel in.

Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old;
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land;
Ring in the CHRIST that is to be!

Would that those verses might be read to-morrow in every church, and, before the day is ended, in every home in the land!

With this last number of the year we are sending out a brief announcement of several series of special articles, which we have arranged to publish during the coming year. For the rest, THE INQUIRER will maintain its endeavour, as stated last year, to be a true Organ of the Churches represented in the National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian, and other Non-Subscribing Congregations, and at the same time to serve a wider public, both at home and abroad, interested in the liberal aspects of religion, the progress of religious thought, the movements of church life, the culture of personal devotion, and all efforts for the advancement of the moral and social well-being of mankind. The main features of the paper will remain as before. What we hope for is the better wisdom, which growing experience ought to bring, and more concentrated energy, to come a little nearer to the ideal of service to which we are pledged. The constant, loyal help, and generous encouragement of many friends have never failed us, and we have no fear that we shall be left without these in the coming year.

What we should like especially to say at this moment is that we are always glad when fresh hands are stretched out to help. We have strong support, but cannot have too many friends, whose contribution of wisdom and sympathy and inspiration is poured into the common store. THE INQUIRER has no private or party end to serve. It wants simply to help on the cause of truth and living religion and brotherly love. Its great happiness would be to be found truly a source of help, of encouragement, in the common life of our people, to set forth the beauty of the true ideal of fellowship in that life, and the joy of the unselfish service of righteousness and compassion and loving kindness. Whoever has a word to say that will touch true human sympathies, or give fresh insight into the beauty that is all about us and can be wrought into the substance of our common daily life, that can deepen the sense of the Divine presence, and the victorious power of righteousness, if only people will have faith, let him see whether it cannot find utterance in these columns, and will not receive a warm and grateful welcome. Our service has chiefly to be done for love. But then, is not that worth while?

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1905.

RETROSPECT of home affairs for this year may be pardoned if it turns with a sigh of relief from the Parliamentary record, and from Monday, December 4, when Mr. Balfour at last resigned, sets its face resolutely to the coming time. Next day Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman accepted office as Prime Minister, and proceeded at once to form a Liberal Government of strong and capable men.

So ended ten years of Unionist administration, which included the whole miserable course of the South African War, before the close of which Queen Victoria died. Lord Salisbury was succeeded as Prime Minister by Mr. Balfour in 1902, and since then we have had the Education Act, with its accompaniment of popular protest marked by the Passive Resistance movement, and the Licensing Act, no less vehemently opposed. The fiscal controversy brought confusion into the ranks of the Unionists, and at last the end has come. There has been as yet no General Election since the accession of King Edward VII.

The announcement of the new Cabinet was received with very general satisfaction, and abroad is regarded as making for stability and international peace. Trusted men who served under Gladstone are joined by newcomers of marked ability, the democratic element being more decidedly represented than in any previous Government. On Thursday, December 21, the Prime Minister addressed a great and enthusiastic meeting of Londoners in the Albert Hall, and made a fine speech, without finesse, earnest and straightforward, declaring the principles and aims of the new administration.

The maintenance of Free Trade, the securing of popular control over education and the liquor traffic, readjustment of Poor Law administration and strenuous effort to deal with the problem of the unemployed, land and rating reform, with new power for municipalities, "the colonising of our own country," "to make the land less of a pleasure-ground for the rich, and more of a treasure-house for the nation," such were some of the indications which the speech contained of what the Government intends. Two statements were made on matters of Imperial administration: First, that in India the civil, and not the military, authority is to be supreme; and, second, that in South Africa the importation of Chinese coolies is at once to be stopped. The progress of the principle of arbitration was warmly welcomed, and a serious warning uttered as to the danger of the enormous growth of armaments to the peace of the world. During the past ten years the expenditure of this country on Army and Navy has been doubled. While the Prime Minister rejoiced that this country is on the best of terms with all other nations, and expressed his desire to operate with them in the common work of civilisation, he declared the intention, in the interest of home politics, to restore the authority of Parliament, and bring it into closer touch with the lives of the people. The principle and aims involved in this declaration, together with the record of the late Government, will be submitted immediately to the verdict of the country at a General Election to be held as early as possible in the New Year. There seems very little doubt as to the result.

The year now ending opened with the news of the fall of Port Arthur, but this did not end the war between Russia and Japan. For months the terrible conflict on land continued, and the battle of Mukden was fought out from the end of February to March 12, when the Russians were driven back. The carnage was inconceivable, and close upon a million men were said to have been engaged in this "greatest battle of history." Meanwhile the Russian fleet from the Baltic was making its way to the East, but only to be destroyed, May 27, 28, in the Straits of Korea. A fortnight later, Russia and Japan had agreed to President Roosevelt's offer to bring them together to discuss terms of peace. After long negotiations, which seemed on the point of failure, it was announced on August 29 that peace was made, and on September 5 M. Witte and Baron Komura, for Russia and Japan respectively, signed the Treaty of Portsmouth. Japan reckoned the cost of the war at 180 millions, and had demanded an indemnity of 120 millions, but at the last moment gave up this and other claims. The news of peace came as an intense relief to the whole civilised world.

It did not, however, by any means bring internal peace to Russia. It has been a year of Nemesis for that unhappy country. The miseries which the war entailed for the masses of the people did but accentuate the seething discontent of revolutionary forces drawn from all classes of society, which had long been working against the oppressive government of a selfish bureaucracy, groping and striving after some better thing. It has been a year of confusion, more and more accentuated as revolution, lurid with massacre, touched with gleams of hope, as often disappointed, in the concessions of the Tsar towards a more democratic government, and what the issue will be it is impossible to forecast. Certainly, the power of the people, especially manifest in the well-organised forces of labour, has risen up as never before to make a return to the Autocracy for ever impossible. What the mind of the Tsar has been throughout this year we do not attempt to say. January 22 witnessed the cruel massacre of unarmed crowds of the people in St. Petersburg, followed on February 17 by the assassination of the Grand Duke Sergius. April 30 brought the edict of religious toleration followed by the resignation of M. Pobiedonostzeff, Procurator of the Holy Synod. On August 19 the Tsar issued a manifesto constituting a representative assembly to be elected from the whole country, with the exception of Finland, and to meet in January next, and on October 30 still more decidedly, the decree of a constitution, giving freedom of conscience, speech, assembly, and association, and Count Witte was appointed Prime Minister. But throughout these months every concession appears to have come too late, and there have been constantly recurring outbreaks of revolt or of outrage, such as the horrible massacres of the Jews, remorseless measures of repression, as in Poland, mutiny of troops and warships, widespread strikes such as that which secured once more a constitution for Finland, and those which seemed, for a time at least, to hold the chief cities of the Empire. It is indeed a hope long deferred, to be achieved through untold suffering, that the friends of Russia must cherish at this time.

In happy contrast to all this misery and confusion has been the peaceful issue of the revolution in Scandinavia, which has brought the separation of Norway from Sweden, and the election of Prince Charles of Denmark, son-in-law of our King, to the throne of Norway as Haakon VII.

As regards the relations of this country to Continental Powers, it has been a year of growing friendship, with prospect of better understanding and closer sympathies. Before peace was made between Russia and Japan, the new Anglo-Japanese Treaty for the next ten years was signed in London (August 12) by Lord Lansdowne and Viscount Hayashi, securing the independence and integrity of China, and making for general peace in the East.

Ecclesiastical Affairs.

The law for the separation of Church and State in France was passed by an overwhelming majority in the Chamber on February 10 and on December 6, without any amendment, by the Senate, so that it was at once promulgated, and comes into force on New Year's Day. It will bring a time of serious trial to the Protestant Churches of France, which have hitherto received subvention from the State, and for this they have been vigorously preparing. The great question is whether in the Reformed Church the various sections will be able to unite, to form one strong body, or whether the ultra-orthodox, who form the wealthier section, will refuse to tolerate the liberals within a single union.

In Germany the liberals are engaged in a serious conflict with the ruling powers of orthodoxy in the Church. The Protestantenverein has been specially active in maintaining the right of a due place within the fold, working for a stronger representation on the governing bodies of the Church, and maintaining the cause of the heretics who in various places have been subject to attack. The Union of the "Friends of the Christian World" is also fully aware of the need of strenuous exertion, and there has been a greatly increased activity in the publication of liberal religious literature.

In Great Britain the most notable feature of the year has been, perhaps, the continuance in full vigour of the remarkable revival in Wales. For the North, the Scottish Church Bill was passed, to settle differences between the sections of the United Free Church, and incidently a new liberty was secured to the Established Church, to modify its terms of subscription. In the Church of England, Dr. Talbot, formerly of Rochester, has become the first bishop of the new see of Southwark, with the historic church of St. Saviour's as his cathedral. It was there that Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador, before his return home, unveiled the Harvard memorial window. On the enthronement of Dr. Gore as the first Bishop of Birmingham, there was a pleasant interchange of cordial greeting at a subsequent Town Hall meeting between the Bishop and the Rev. J. H. Jowett as a representative Nonconformist.

On the retirement of the Rev. John Watson from the charge of the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church in Liverpool and from the active ministry, there was an even more remarkable manifestation of interdenominational cordiality and of public recognition, the Lord Mayor and the bishop and representatives of other churches uniting to bear testimony to the value of Dr. Watson's influence in the city.

In July a Baptist World's Convention was held in London, and later in the year General Booth received the freedom of the City. Another mark of the honour and confidence in which the Chief of the Salvation Army is held is the recent gift by Mr. George Herring of £100,000, to be used by the Army in the first instance for a great experiment in home colonisation, and to revert eventually to the King's Hospital Fund.

Among the most remarkable public utterances of the year on religious matters may be noted the two addresses given by Dr. P. T. Forsyth as Chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, in the spring, on "A Holy Church the Moral Guide of Society," and in the autumn on "The Grace of the Gospel as the Moral Authority in the Church." Those who least agree with the dogmatic position of the speaker will yet find much that is suggestive and stimulating in his appeal.

Our Free Churches.

On January 4 there came to us the great loss and the sorrow of the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and in the same month the welcome meeting in London to the Rev. Charles Hargrove, on his return from the Mission to the Unitarians of Australasia, which he undertook as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

It has been a year of notable centenaries, of the birth of F. W. Newman, F. Denison Maurice, Mazzini, and Lloyd Garrison, and of the death of Schiller; but for us the most significant was that of the birth of James Martineau.

The Martineau Centenary.

The first celebration was, naturally, at Norwich, his birthplace, on April 21, the actual day, which was Good Friday, and on Easter Sunday, in the Octagon Chapel. The memorial sermon, preached by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, was on "The Unity of the Spirit," and was published in the Inquirer of April 29. The scheme for the erection of a Martineau Memorial Hall and schools in connection with the Octagon has received widespread support, but has not yet secured the whole of the necessary means. A further celebration took place at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday and Tuesday, May 1 and 2, when Dr. Drummond was again the preacher. His sermon on "Living Communion with God" is in the Inquirer of May 6. On that occasion Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, gave the address, on "The Philosophy of Martineau in Relation to the Idealism of the Present Day," since separately published. Another celebration was at Rochdale on Easter Sunday, in the church which Martineau opened on June 11, 1857, where a memorial was placed by Mr. Richard Heape, and the address (since published) was given by the Rev. Principal Gordon. The centenary was also celebrated in Hungary, both at Budapest and Koloszvar, and the occasion was taken to secure the fine Emslie portrait for Essex Hall. In Liverpool members of the three old congregations united to place a memorial in Hope-street Church, which was dedicated at a special service on Thursday evening, December 14. The address given on that occasion by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter is in the INQUIRER of December 23. The publication by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association of Mr. Carpenter's "James Martineau, Theologian and Teacher: A Study of his Life and Thought" was another contribution to the centenary celebration of abiding worth.

The International Council.

More than two hundred English members attended the third meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Geneva on the four last days of August. The meetings were eminently successful, and were a source of much encouragement and inspiration to workers in the cause of liberal religion gathered from many lands, and in many cases from lonely outposts of duty. The proceedings are to be published at Geneva in a volume to be ready early in the New Year. It was a notable circumstance that from Calvin's pulpit in the Cathedral, placed at the disposal of the Council by the courtesy of the church authorities (with a majority of orthodox members), three sermons were preached on successive days by distinguished heretics, in French, German, and English. The last of these, by Dr. M. J. Savage, of New York, one of the best-known Unitarian ministers in America, on "Religion: Its Changing Forms and its Eternal Essence," appeared in the INQUIRER of September 9, and has since been separately published as a number of Dr. Savage's Messiah Pulpit. It was also translated into Dutch, and appeared in the Hervorming. The French sermon, by the Rev. J. E. Roberty, of Paris, on "Anathema and Faith," appeared in an English translation in the INQUIRER of November 25. The German sermon, by Professor Furrer, of Zurich, from the text "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty," has, unfortunately, not been preserved. On the following Sunday the Rev. Charles Wagner preached, in the Cathedral, the sermon a translation of which appears in our present issue. Professor Chantre, of Geneva, was the honorary President, and Professor Montet, the working President, to whose assiduous labours warm tribute was paid. Among the most striking incidents of the week were the address of the venerable M. Hyacinthe Loyson on "Monotheism" and that on "The Fundamental Principles of Judaism" by the Rabbi Levy of Dijon. Tribute was paid to the memory of Servetus by the placing of a wreath, by the English and American contingent, on the "expiatory" monument at Champel. The news of Peace between Russia and Japan, received on the morning of the second day of the meetings, was celebrated with great enthusiasm. The next meeting of the International Council is to be held in America at Boston in September, 1907.

Home Missionary College.

At mid-summer the last session to be held in the Memorial Hall was brought to a close, and at the same time, a garden party was held with great éclat at Summerville, the new residence in Victoria Park, which has been acquired to commemorate the jubilee of the College. In October, the new session opened at Summerville, and on October 12 a public celebration took place, the new Hall of Residence being declared open by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P.; the Vice-Chancellor of the Victoria University of Manchester, Dr. Alfred Hopkinson, and Professor Peake, Dean of the Theological Faculty, taking cordial part in the proceedings. The President, the Rev. C. C. Coe, was in the chair, and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter of Manchester College, Oxford, was among the speakers. The old students of the College have thrown themselves with the utmost enthusiasm into the promotion of the jubilee scheme, which has resulted in securing this fine residence for the College, and more than three-quarters of the £20,000 asked for as the Jubilee Fund is now promised.

Other Buildings and Celebrations.

It has not been a great year for church building. The appeal of the London District Unitarian Society for £7,500 to secure much-needed churches for the congregations of Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead, failed of an adequate response. The fund has now been closed, and the congregations have still to live in faith and hope. A beginning has, however, been made with the new church building in Aberdeen, and the foundation stone of a church-schoolroom has also been laid for the new congregation at Attercliffe, Sheffield. The Manford-street Church and Mission has been enriched by the building of some fine new club-rooms and an admirable front in Blythe-street.

Of other celebrations, we have recorded during the year the centenary of the Sunday schools, of Bank-street, Bury, and the High Pavement, Nottingham; the jubilee of the Rev. W. Napier in the ministry, and of the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town, London, and the Unitarian Church in Adelaide, S. Australia. The Rev. Joseph Wood's twenty-one years of ministry at the Old Meeting, Birmingham, was also celebrated. Early in the year a memorial to Dr. and Mrs. Brooke Herford was placed in the Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead. On the first Sunday in February, the Lord Mayor of Liverpool paid a visit in civic state to the Mill-street Domestic Mission. At the end of the year we have in our midst Professor Benoyendra Nath Sen, of the Presidency College, Calcutta, who attended the International meetings at Geneva, as representative of the Brahmo Samaj of India, and has since been in America. A reception was given to him at Essex Hall by the President and Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, on December 18.

Literature and Lectures.

One of the chief publications early in the year was of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," and at the close we have the volume of his sermons, with a memoir by his eldest son. Mr. Carpenter's "James Martineau" has been already mentioned in connection with the centenary. To the popular sixpenny editions have been added F. W. Newman's "Soul" and Dr. M. J. Savage's "Passing and Permanent in Religion" (a selection from the complete volume published by G. P. Putnam's Sons). A volume selected from the Hibbert Lectures of Dr. Charles Beard on "The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge" is also about to be issued. We have had also Professor Henry Jones's Essex Hall Lecture on "The Immortality of the Soul in the Poems of Tennyson and Browning," Dr. Brooke Herford's "Eutychus" papers, the Rev. Walter Lloyd's "Theist's Apology," the Rev. H. S. Solly's "Know Thyself," "An Attempt to Answer certain Questions Relating to Duty, to God, and to Immortality"—a new edition rewritten and much enlarged, of an earlier work—and the new edition of Professor Albert Réville's "History of the Dogma of the Deity of Jesus Christ." Of the new series of "Sermons by Unitarian Ministers" the first twelve have also been issued in a volume, and the publication continues. An essay by Mr. Maurice Adams on "Giordano Bruno" has also been published, and Dr. Mellone's centenary address on Martineau and Newman is to be similarly issued. Among recent tracts have been "Prayer," by Dr. C. G. Ames, "Incarnation," by W. C. Gannett, "The Immortal Hope," by J. W. Chadwick, and "Modern Biblical Criticism," by Dr. C. H. Toy.

Mr. Carpenter's course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" was given at Norwich and Hull early in the year, and at Birmingham in the autumn; while two lectures on "The Gospels and How to Read Them" were given at various places in the North during the first course and in the West in the autumn. It may be also noted here that Mr. Carpenter was this year the Jowett lecturer at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, where he gave ten lectures on "The Earliest Sources of the Life of Jesus."

Ministerial Changes.

Of the ministerial changes during the year, we may note first a number of retirements, most of which mean, as we hope, only temporary withdrawal from active service. Thus the Rev. E. W. Lummis was obliged to resign his charge of the Great Meeting, Leicester, and is spending the winter at Davos. There also is the Rev. Edgar Lockett, who had to give up his work at Pudsey. The Rev. H. S. Tayler has concluded his ministry of twenty years at Dukinfield. The Rev. S. Burrows resigned his charge at Dover, the Rev. C. E. Pike at Newport, the Rev. G. Critchley at Kentish Town. The Rev. C. D. Badland is giving up his work at Whitchurch and will reside at Kidderminster. Dr. Warschauer resigned Clifton, and has entered the Congregationalist ministry.

Of the students of Manchester College, Oxford, who concluded their course in June, the Rev. A. Thornhill has become minister at Carlisle, the Rev. A. Golland with the Rev. F. K. Freeston at Essex Church, Kensington, and the Rev. C. M. Wright, with the Rev. Joseph Wood, at the Old Meeting, Birmingham. Other new comers into our ministry are the Rev. Arthur Hurn, of Acton, and the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, of Peckham (whose health, unfortunately, has broken down), both of whom had studied for the Wesleyan ministry, and the Rev. R. H. Maister, who has gone to Stockton. Mr. W. T. Bushrod, who had served as a lay-preacher in the south, has become minister at Chorley, and Mr. Delta Evans, editor of the Christian Life, has taken charge of the congregation at Southend.

Among the year's settlements are the following:—The Rev. J. Page Hopps, at Little Portland-street, London; the Rev. H. D. Roberts, at Hope-street Church, Liverpool, in succession to the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, with whom he was previously co-pastor; the Rev. Felix Taylor, at Richmond; the Rev. Priestley Prime at Brighton; the Rev. H. Rawlings at Hackney; the Rev. H. M. Livens at Newport, I.W.; the Rev. R. H. Greaves at York. The Rev. W. C. Hall has removed from Ashton to Small Heath, Birmingham; the Rev. W. H. Burgess from Accrington to Loughborough and Ilkeston, as N.M. District Minister; the Rev. J. E. Stead from Park-lane to Mossley; the Rev. H. Cross from Stockton to Dewsbury, as assistant to the district minister of the Yorkshire Union; the Rev. H. K. White from Urmston to Ashton; the Rev. John Evans from Halliwell-road, Bolton, to Colne; the Rev. D. J. Williams from Merthyr to Belper; the Rev. Charles Roper from Moss Side, Manchester, to Kilburn; the Rev. E. I. Fripp from Mansfield to Clifton. Other changes and settlements are about to be made.

During the autumn the movement to establish Unitarian services at Blackburn and at Newport, Mon., has been vigorously promoted. The services at Nelson have been held throughout the year.

Obituary.

The year's obituary includes the names of Mgr. Nugent, of Liverpool, Dr. Barnardo, Sir George Williams, founder of the Y.M.C.A., Bishop Ellicott, of Gloucester, the Rev. J. A. Mitchell, secretary of the Congregational Union, the Hon. John Hay, American Secretary of State, author of the saying that war is "the most futile and the most ferocious of human follies," George Macdonald, Sir Henry Irving, Sir Wemyss Reid, Sir J. S. Burdon-Sanderson, Sir Richard Jebb, Professor van Manen, of Leiden, Professor A. S. Wilkins, Dr. Orello Cone, the American New Testament scholar, the Rev. W. R. Alger, author of a "Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," William Sharpe (also "Fiona Macleod"), Miss E. A. Manning, hon. secretary of the National Indian Association; the venerable Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, who followed the Raja Rammohun Roy, as the second founder of the Brahmo Samaj, and another distinguished Brahmo, Protab Chunder Mozoomdar. Our Hungarian brethren have lost Professor John Kovacs, and the Rev. Charles Derzsi.

From our roll of ministers we have lost the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, Peter Dean, H. W. Ellis, J. J. George, A. B. Hamilton, A. Harvie, Iden Payne, S. Jenkinson, R. Lyttle, and W. Whitelegge. Laymen, who rendered devoted ministerial service, were Messrs. J. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, C. F. Dear of Portsmouth, formerly at Southend, and John Keates of Trowbridge. The Rev. John Williams, formerly of Christ Church, Nottingham, has also passed away.

The names of Mrs. James Worthington and Mr. Charles Harding were not recorded last year, as it was quite at the end of the year they passed away. Among those who have passed during the present year from the fellowship of our churches, we must record the names of Robert Hampson, F. N. Fordham, John W. Crompton, T. Smith Osler, Alfred Preston, John Warren (of London), John Warren (of Nottingham), Thomas Birchall, H. A. R. Joy, Walter Lewin, Robert Fielding, A. J. Hibbert, George Brothers, George Jevons, T. A. Wykes, C. D. Badland (father of the Rev. C. D. Badland), Donald Wilson, John Edward Taylor, H. J. Morton, and James Booth; Mrs. Orlando Oldham, Miss Fanny Malcolm, Mrs. Greenhow, Mrs. George Cooper, Miss J. C. Fallows, Mrs. Rebecca Moore, Mrs. Anthony, Mrs. Harland, Miss Slatter, Miss E. S. Busk, Mrs. Wells, Miss Alice Field, Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot, and Miss Clara Potter. These and many others have passed from the visible fellowship, but not from that deeper fellowship of the hidden life, in which, by the Grace Divine, it is given to love "to keep its own eternally."

AMAVIMUS—AMAMUS—AMABIMUS.

They have met—but not in a realm of shades;
'Tis we who are dreamers and grope in gloom,
Where a glimpse of truth into falsehood fades,
And we shudder at death as our doom.

They have met in a land of increasing light,
That waxes ever to perfect day;
Where wrong goes right, and the darkness bright,
As they mount on their upward way.

No trammels of self confine the soul
That merges its life in the Sea of Love;
We lose a part but to find the whole,
We sink but to soar above.

A Spirit divine is our vital breath,
Like the flute of Pan is the brain inspired;
From narrowing channels released by death,
We shall win what the soul desired.

New music, grander and sweeter far,
Shall sound when the shepherd's pipe is broken;
No mists shall mar Heaven's brightest star,
No word but Love shall be spoken.

RELIGIOUS LITERATURE IN 1905.

The religious literature of the past year may be described as rather colourless. It has not failed in quantity or scholarship, but our impression is that it has been distinctly poor in books of real worth. It bears upon it the marks of an age of transition, when men are much occupied with finding plausible arguments for discredited positions. It is, of course, the Nemesis of real thinking when the mind abandons the search for truth in order to plead a case; but it is in this game of the law-courts, with the religious public for jury, that the theological advocate plays his part to-day. It is done in most cases quite sincerely, only it has this fatal weakness that it never convinces the other side; and men of fine abilities are inclined to regard all religious controversy as unreal, a warfare of words among bitter partisans.

That the cause of religion suffers seriously on this account at the present time there can be little doubt; and it is likely to continue to do so so long as its thinkers and advocates are content to live in an unreal world and to use unreal arguments. In the ordinary affairs of life a profound revolution has taken place in human thinking. Science and history have spoken their word, and we are beginning to adjust our thought with ease to the new conception of the universe, the vast extension of historic time, and the rigorous demands of evidence. Theology alone is left in an uncomfortable state of protest. If it stretches out the left hand timidly to touch the new truth, it still grasps the Ptolemaic astronomy and Archbishop Ussher's chronology with firm defiance in the right. Such a statement will be greeted with a chorus of dissent; but the atmosphere of a large number of theological books, their quiet assumption that it is only in a few minor details that religious truth needs re-statement, and their aloofness from the real difficulties of the modern mind, are stubborn facts on the other side. Mr. Mallock has reminded us lately in his incisive way that the traditional cosmogony of the churches has collapsed like a house of cards. Perhaps the collapse is not as complete as he imagines. It still drags out a precarious existence as a sufficient explanation of the universe, in popular preaching and in the refusal of theology fully and frankly to recognise its disappearance.

We have been struck lately by the revival in apologetic literature of interest in the credibility of the New Testament miracles, and by the unanimity with which it is conceded that they are to be accepted on the ground of faith and not of evidence. The evidence is not good enough to satisfy the impartial unbeliever, so the argument seems to me, but for Christian faith rooted in the doctrine of the Incarnation there are no difficulties. Moreover, the miracles are congruous with the character of Christ, and so are likely to have happened. Christ is the evidence for miracles, instead of miracles being the evidence for Christ. Of course no other historical events would be accepted for similar reasons, and the writers who are most earnest in pressing the argument home do not see how hazardous it is to make our belief in events, which are supposed to be of unique importance for religion, depend upon our sense of their congruity with the divine activity and perfect character. Everything is reduced to the question whether we feel the congruity or not, and it would be hard to prove that a man is wanting in religious sensibility because he can see no connection between spiritual excellence and the power to turn water into wine. This whole mode of argument comes dangerously near to a plea for believing what we wish to believe in spite of the evidence. The question of real importance which emerges from it is this: If the evidence for miracles is so imperfect, can they be regarded as a permanent and essential element in Christianity? This is one of the questions which theological thought looks at rather askance. It does not wish tc be forced to answer it, and so it betakes itself to the pleasant game of inventing novel reasons for clinging to the old positions. But still the plain man will ask the uncomfortable question, How about the evidence?

As a counterpoise to this unwillingness to grapple with the real problems of theological reconstruction we may notice two signs of advance. The historical treatment of the Old Testament literature is no longer a question of much controversy. The books which appear occasionally with a divine mission to denounce the critics, are the swan-song, a little hoarse and angry, of a dying cause. But another danger is close upon us. There are far too many books dealing with the Old Testament. Most of them say the same thing in different words. The sacred text is in danger from the lavish industry of its admirers. A book like Dr. Harper's recent commentary on Amos and Hosea hides the glory of the literature it is meant to expound under the weight and volume of its learning. We recommend to Old Testament scholars a self-denying ordinance against publishing, lest they forge for us the chains of a new scholasticism, and our last state be worse than the first. The other sign of advance is to be seen in the rapid growth of the study of comparative religion in popular favour. The University of Manchester has given it recognition in its theological faculty; and every year adds to the number of books devoted to it. Naturally, during the past year attention has been drawn specially to the religion and ethics of Japan. It is of happy augury for the international sympathy which is the best safeguard of international peace.

But from vague impressions we must come to some details of books published during the past year. If the rest of this article reads like a catalogue we make no apologies. Is not the pleasure of reading the description of a book in a catalogue next door neighbour to that of possessing it oneself?

The issue of the second volume of Harnack's "Expansion of Christianity" in the Theological Translation Fund has placed a book of first-rate importance in the hands of English readers. Nowhere else is the story of the missionary activity of the Early Church told with such fulness of detail, and such a vivid sense of its historical importance. The work of translation has been done with great care and thoroughness by Dr. Moffatt, and he has consulted the convenience of readers who have little Latin and no Greek by giving an English version of the numerous illustrative passages quoted from original sources. Side by side with Harnack's book we may place Dr. Bigg's small volume of lectures on "The Church's Task under the Roman Empire." Within its limits it is an admirable piece of work, written not only with the resources of ample scholarship, but with fine historical sympathy with the human side of the struggle and a just appreciation of the best elements in the ancient culture and religion. Professor Bury's "St. Patrick," the most notable ecclesiastical biography of the year, carries forward the story of the imperial expansion of Christianity into Ireland.

Canon Sanday has published separately the article on Jesus Christ which he contributed to Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible with the title "Outlines of the Life of Christ." Some criticism of it has appeared already in these columns. It represents the Anglican via media at its best, and the unconscious influence of the Catholic creeds upon a scholar of finely balanced historical judgment. His volume of lectures on "The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel" is a much stronger and more satisfactory piece of work; and those who disagree with him most widely upon the crucial questions of the authorship and historical significance of the Gospel, will do well to give heed to many of his warnings. His reserve of judgment in cases where the evidence is weak or conflicting, and his insistent plea for the humanising of criticism cannot be urged upon us too strongly. "In looking back over a distant past it is always difficult to keep the true perspective," is a warning which can hardly be repeated too often in face of many overconfident judgments, and fanciful but really unimaginative pictures of the past.

The only book of the year which has claim to be regarded as the manifesto of a school of thought is the volume of Cambridge Essays issued recently under the editorship of Dr. Swete. It represents adequately the moderating tendencies of the Cambridge school. It is neither High nor Broad, and it hardly goes beyond the attempt to provide the Anglican position with a modest equipment of new weapons in place of those that have grown rusty. These men have neither seen the promised land, nor recovered some forgotten treasure of Catholic truth. They are not likely to start a heresy, or recall a church from the error of its ways. Their book is quiet, dignified, and unimpressive, without unity of idea or the glow of a common purpose. Canon Wilson appears among the other essayists in rather strange company. If his idea of revelation, as an experience within the soul, had been adopted as the keynote of the book, attention would have been aroused and a new principle introduced into the criticism of traditional theology. We are convinced that the central problem that Christianity has to face at the present time is the discovery of a position of stable equilibrium between experience and history. But in this direction the Cambridge essayists do not help us very much. For the most part, indeed, they do not seem to realise that it exists as a problem at all.

Two small books, both marked by freshness and vigour, should not be overlooked. "The Creed of Christ," by an anonymous writer, is a powerful study of the Gospel teaching, and it contains incidentally one of the most eloquent pleas that we have met with recently for the abandonment of the idea that revelation is the same as theological information imparted to the mind, that we can know about God as we know about material things, and "that, therefore, knowledge of God can be received in a series of propositions, instead of being secretly assimilated, as light and life, by the growing and expanding soul."

Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, in "Religion, a Criticism and a Forecast," approaches the subject from the point of view of reverent agnosticism; but there is more to be learnt from him than from many teachers of a more perfect creed. Moreover, he is the most charming literary representative, among living writers, of an attitude of mind, sceptical and yet devout, which is far richer in Christian sympathies and affirmations than appears on the surface. The man who does not call himself a Christian, and is most deeply dissatisfied with the inherited creed of the Church, may be a friend in disguise. His disagreement with ecclesiastical standards is no measure of his distance from the mind of Christ.

Among the books which are likely to have special interest for the readers of THE INQUIRER, we may mention Mr. Carpenter's "Life of Dr. Martineau," the issue in separate volumes of Mr. Upton's "Study of Dr. Martineau's Philosophy," and Professor Henry Jones' Centenary Address on the same subject. We have also had R. A. Armstrong's lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," which rekindles the sense of loss in the going from us of our most gifted popular expositor of these deep questions of religious life. In "The Coming Church," Dr. Hunter has painted a glowing ideal, not the less exhilarating because it belongs to a land that is ery far off, and some critics have assailed it because it is too Christian for this imperfect world. The "New Hymnal," with its fine musical edition, has enriched the possibilities of congregational worship. If other books may be read in borrowed copies, certainly this one should be bought in large quantities.

Finally let us send a word of cheer to the Hibbert Journal on completing another year of life. It still pursues its victorious way under its intrepid editor. It gathers of every kind into its net, and bewilders us all by its kaleidoscopic opinions. No publication of the day succeeds so well in bringing on to a common platform the varieties of religious attitude and experience; and it is all done with admirable temper and mutual respect. It is the organ of no party. It promulgates no programme. It exists to give every man a free field and no favour. It lives by discussion. But what is the end to be? Will it finally bring to a focus the scattered rays of light? Will it form a meeting ground for the liberal men in all churches as they press forward into the church that is to be? Or will it be content to go on discussing until the millennium dawns? These are questions which it is natural to ask. Meanwhile, we are all glad to congratulate it upon its well-thumbed copies in our public libraries, and its own position of happy irresponsibility.

A PRAYER OF THE DYING YEAR.

BY THE LATE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

HOLY God, thou Father dear,
Now on this declining day
Of the old and dying year,
Hear the prayer I pray:

Let me see my inner mind
As my mind is seen of Thee,
All its weakness, folly blind,
Show them, Lord, to me.

All the good I meant to do,
Good, alas! I have not done,
All my disobedience to
The spirit of Thy Son.

Let me see them as they are,
In the piercing light of heaven,
See how I have wandered far,
By my self-love driven.

Undeceive me, Lord of right,
Show to me each secret fault,
How I cowered from the light
In my sins' dark vault.

Visions I have had, dear God,
Of the clearer, purer day;
Yet in faithlessness have trod
By the lower way.

Resolutions I have made
Oft, to follow Thy sweet will:
Presently have been afraid,
Clung to darkness still.

Lord! infuse into my soul
Spirit new and strong and brave,
Strong, though seas of trial roll,
Still to "breast the wave."

Aid me, Father, in my need,
That at last I be made whole,
Vision ripen into deed,
Thy strength in my soul.

May the year be new indeed,
New the heaven and new the earth,
New the springing of the seed,
New my spirit's birth!

IT is good news, indeed, which Miss Octavia Hill was able to send to last week's Spectator in the following note:—"I am glad to be able to report that, including sums received and promised, the entire £12,000 required for the purchase of Gowbarrow Fell and Aira Force has been secured well within the appointed time, and that the National Trust is in a position to proceed with the purchase in the New Year. . . . We shall still be glad to receive contributions from any who desire to take part in the scheme. Twelve thousand pounds is the bare purchase price, and there are legal and other expenses to be met, which, unless specially subscribed, will tax seriously the general funds of he Trust. Besides this, as we stated in our appeal, there is land of special beauty which we greatly hope to obtain adjoining that now to be bought; for this land we have a five years' option of purchase, and to this we shall devote any additional funds which reach us."

THE only way to a knowledge of God lies through getting first into service and sympathy and communion with our fellow men.—G. S. Merriam.

SHORT NOTICES.

Who's Who, 1906, that invaluable book of reference for contemporary biography, continues to grow. The volume for the coming year has eighty pages more of biographies than the previous edition, and further particulars are added where required—i.e., motor and telephone numbers and telegraphic addresses. In many cases, also, the number of a man's sons and daughters are given. (A. & C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

Who's Who Year Book, 1906, is, as before, the relief train. The increasing biographies have crowded almost everything else out of the original book. So here we have separately issued lists of various kinds—diplomatic, ecclesiastical, legal, House of Commons, Government, clubs, press, schools, &c. It is the fate of such books to be printed beforehand—and the world moves. Thus we have for 1906 the shades of the late Government! (A. & C. Black, 1s. net.)

The Duties of Women, a course of lectures by Frances Power Cobbe, given in 1881, is issued in a posthumous edition, under the care of Miss Blanche Atkinson. The preface written by the late Frances Willard for the eighth American edition is included, and also, as a last preface by Miss Cobbe herself, dated from Hengwrt, Feb., 1901, a reply to some strictures on her position by the Rev. Minot J. Savage, of New York (not "Meriot Savage," as here printed), which appeared in the Christian Register. Miss Cobbe's lectures are as good to read now as they were a generation ago, and by men as well as women. (Sonnenschein & Co., 2s. 6d.)

In the Name of the Bodleian, and other Essays, by Augustine Birrell, twenty-seven essays by the (now) Minister of Education and author of "Obiter Dicta." Some of these have already appeared in the Speaker, and the essay on Mr. Bradlaugh was in the Nineteenth Century. Mr. Birrell talks very pleasantly, especially about old books, and this new volume is sure of a warm welcome from many friends who do not tire of listening to him. (Elliot Stock, 5s. net.)

The True Story of George Eliot, in relation to "Adam Bede," giving the real life history of the more important characters, by William Mottram (grand-nephew of Adam and Seth Bede and cousin to the author); with eighty-six illustrations, mainly from photographs. A book of the greatest interest for all lovers of George Eliot. The chapter on her "marriage with George H. Lewes" is of special interest. (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d. net.)

From the De la More Press (32, George-street, Hanover-square, W.) is issued a beautiful new edition of Mrs. Barbauld's Hymns in Prose for children. There is a symbolic frontispiece, which appears also on the cover. The book is about the size of the bound volume of Young Days, and the hymns are printed in large, clear type. It is an admirable specimen of printing. (2s. 6d. net.) From the same publishers we have received three dainty booklets in a case; one containing the Ancient Mariner, the other two, Odes of Shelley and Keats respectively. (De la More Press. The three together, 1s. 6d. net.)

The Schoolboy Abroad, by Ascott R. Hope, author of "Ready-made Romance," &c., is a series of chapters, part of which have appeared in the Journal of Education, describing how boys fare at school in various countries. "German Schoolboys," "French Collegians," "Swiss Holidays," "A Danish Boyhood," are some of the chapters. This last is the story of Henry Steffens, who was born in 1773. (A. & C. Black, 5s.)

Life in Morocco and Glimpses Beyond, by Budgett Meakin, author of "The Moors," "Model Factories and Villages," &c., with twenty-four illustrations, gathers up a large amount of information, some of which the author has already published in magazines and reviews. The subject is picturesque and fascinating, and the many admirable illustrations add greatly to the value of the book. (Chatto & Windus, 12s. 6d. net.)

The Complete Works of Beaumont and Fletcher are to be issued in ten volumes in the Cambridge English Classics Series, edited by Mr. Arnold Glover, of Trinity College and the Inner Temple. It is a great undertaking, which will meet a want long felt by students of English literature. Vol. I., now published, contains "The Maid's Tragedy" and four other plays, and with other introductory matter, verses of commendation, &c., a reproduction of the title-page of the 1679 edition, "Fifty Comedies and Tragedies. All in one Volume." Vol. II. is announced for January. (Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d. net per volume; subscription for complete work, £2 net.)

The Oxford Edition of the Complete Poetical Works of William Cowper, edited by H. S. Milford, M.A., contains some fresh poems not in Canon Benham's edition of 1870, but the editor admits that they do not add much to the poet's fame. There is an added interest in this edition from the reproduction of the old title-pages of the Poems of 1782 and The Task, 1785, taken from the Bodleian copies. There is no biography, but a chronological table and a number of notes. The reputed Romney, from the National Portrait Gallery, is given as frontispiece. The text of the poems is printed in good, clear type. (Henry Frowde: Oxford University Press, 2s.; on Oxford India paper, 5s.)

Among other books we have received are the following:—

Howard Letters and Memoirs, by William Tallack, formerly Secretary of the Howard Association. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

Jesus and the Prophets. An Historical, Exegetical, and Interpretative Discussion by Charles S. Macfarland, Ph.D. (Yale), with Introduction by Dr. F. K. Sanders, of Yale. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, 6s. net.)

The Evolution of Religion. An Anthropological Study by L. R. Farnell, M.A. D.Litt. "Crown Theological Library." (Williams & Norgate, 5s.)

The History of Early Christian Literature, by Baron Hermann von Soden, D.D., of Berlin. "Crown Theological Library." (Williams & Norgate, 5s.)

The Theology of Civilisation, by C. F. Dole. New edition. (H. R. Allenson, 3s. 6d.)

The Coming People, a Study of Life in its Religious and Social Aspects, by C. F. Dole. First English edition. (H. R. Allenson, 3s. 6d.)

Who Wrote the Bible? A Book for the People, by Washington Gladden, D.D. Cheap edition. (James Clarke & Co., 1s. 6d. net.)

Christianity and Progress, by J. W. Petavel, author of "A Coming Revolution," &c. (Sonnenschein & Co., 6d. net.)

The Christ of the Children, a Life of Jesus for Young People, by the Rev. J. G. Stevenson. Illustrated. (James Clarke & Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

Golden Truths for Young Folk, collected by J. Ellis, author of "The Tool Basket," &c. (James Clarke & Co.)

My Neighbour and God, a Criticism of "God and My Neighbour," by W. J. Lee, author of "The Two Gospels," "The Deity of Christ," &c. (James Clarke & Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

A Reasonable Faith, a Reply to Saladin the Agnostic, by the Rev. Angus Mackay, B.A., Rector of Holy Trinity Church, Edinburgh. (Hodder & Stoughton, 1s. net.)

The Rise of Philip Barrett, by David Lyall. (James Clarke & Co., 6s.)

Law's Serious Call. (H. R. Allenson, 6d.)

The Eternal Life, by Hugo Münsterberg, Professor of Psychology in Harvard University. (Constable, 2s. 6d.).

Thoughts after Business Hours, by a City Man. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co., 2s. 6d.)

Old Beliefs and New Knowledge, by the Rev. C. L. Drawbridge, M.A., author of "The Training of the Twig." (Longmans, 1s. 6d. net.)

Why We Believe. Essays on Religion and Brotherhood, by Philip Whitwell Wilson. (James Clarke & Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

I. N. R. I.: A Prisoner's Story of the Cross, by Peter Rosegger. Translated by Elizabeth Lee. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

World Organisation, by Raymond L. Bridgman. Published for the International Union. (Ginn & Co., Boston, 50 cents.)

The Outsiders: A Sketch of the Social Work of the Salvation Army, by Annie S. Swan, with an Introduction by General Booth. (101, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., 1s.)

The Sunday School Hymnary: A Twentieth Century Hymnal for Young People. Words and Music. Edited by Carey Bonner. An admirable collection, most admirably edited. (Sunday School Union, 57 and 59, Ludgate-hill, E.C. 4s., limp cloth, 3s.; paper, 2s. 6d.)

The Story of Magdalen Duckett, a narrative of Quaker Persecution, by Ernest E. Taylor. A story of the North Country, well told, with four charming illustrations. Booklet in paper cover. (Headley Bros., 6d. net.)

A Peculiar People: The Doukhobors, by Aylmer Maude, author of "Tolstoy and His Problems," with illustrations. (Constable & Co., 6s. net.)

The Inward Light, by Amary H. Bradford (of Montelau, New Jersey). (James Clarke & Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

Betting and Gambling, A National Evil, edited by B. Seebohm Rowntree, author of "Poverty." (Macmillan & Co., 5s. net.)

In Peril of Change. Essays written in Time of Tranquillity, by C. F. B. Masterman, M.A., Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

Social Law in the Spiritual World. Studies in Human and Divine Inter-Relationship, by Rufus M. Jones, A.M., Litt.D., Professor of Philosophy in Haverford College. (Headley Bros., 5s. net.)

Sacred Literature, by George L. Hurst. "The Temple Cyclopædic Primers." (Dent & Co., 1s. net.)

Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities. (Chatto & Windus, 1s. 6d.)

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Atherton.—The Christmas Day morning service at Chowbent Chapel was largely attended by old and young, and the annual tea party in the evening was, as usual, a great success. The Rev. J. J. Wright has this season been giving a series of Sunday evening lectures on "The Novels of the Bible," followed by a series on "Christian Principles applied to the Drink Question," "Work," "Money," and "War," and these appear to have proved both attractive and helpful to many people. The subject of study by the Guild for this season is "Robert Elsmere," a book which lends itself remarkably well for the purposes of liberal theological and religious instruction in a most interesting fashion to young people. There are as many as sixty members at present reading the book, over forty of whom meet fortnightly for the discussion of it under Mr. Wright's guidance. The Leigh Guild is at work on the same book.

Bristol: Domestic Mission.—The annual Christmas tea of the attendants at the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission was held at the mission in Montague-street on the evening of Dec. 19. There were between sixty and seventy present at the tea. Mrs. Broadrick, who is now entrusted with the temporary charge of the mission, received admirable support from several friends from the Oakfield-road congregation in carrying out the arrangements. A meeting was afterwards held in the new building, when Mr. P. J. Worsley presided over an excellent attendance, amongst those present being the High Sheriff and Miss Riseley, the Revs. A. N. Blatchford and E. I. Fripp, and Mr. and Mrs. J. Kenrick Champion, Miss Worsley, and Miss Wetherman. The Chairman said that many changes had taken place during the past year. One that was evidently needed was the improvement in the appearance of the room. Their missionary had left for another sphere, and temporarily they had secured the services of an exceedingly capable lady for the work in Mrs. Broadrick. He had known her for many years, and had seen and known how valuable her services were. Mr. Champion extended on behalf of the committee, subscribers, and attendants, a very hearty welcome to Mrs. Broadrick. He referred to the great help she had been to her husband in years gone by in the Western Union, when he was a minister at Bridgwater, and wished her God-speed in the work she was undertaking as their missionary. Mrs. Broadrick acknowledged the welcome in an impressive and hopeful speech. The High Sheriff said he had been connected with the parish for thirty years, and his sympathies went beyond the actual congregation at St. James's. They went through the whole parish. He realised that there were interests besides those of the Church of England, and appreciated the good work of other bodies. He thought that it was the duty of every young man to seek to do some good for the city, and to serve it when called upon. He referred to some of the old friends he had in the Lewin's Mead Mission, mentioning amongst them the Rev. A. N. Blatchford and Mr. Worsley. He could speak on behalf of the vicar and clergy of the parish in saying that the work of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission had their most hearty sympathies. In conclusion, he spoke words of encouragement to the scholars, and hoped that they would take as their motto "Trust and hope." Miss Riseley distributed the prizes to the elder children. By the kindness of the High Sheriff, each of the scholars received a box of chocolates. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford extended a cordial welcome to the Rev. E. I. Fripp, the newly elected minister of Oakfield-road congregation. He felt sure that the mission would have much cause for thankfulness through Mr. Fripp's association with its various agencies. The Rev. E. I. Fripp briefly responded. During the evening an excellent musical programme was provided. Votes of thanks to the High Sheriff, Miss Riseley, and the chairman concluded the meeting.

Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—The Wilbraham-road Church is about to sustain a heavy loss by the removal of two of its most active members, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Pilling, to Blackburn. The monthly "social" held on Saturday, December 9th, was made the occasion of a presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Pilling, consisting of an address, signed by the minister and officers of the church, and presents for themselves and their children. The address, which had "as a labour of love" been very tastefully executed and ornamented by a member of the Church, testified to the high honour and esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Pilling are held by their fellow members of the Church. The presentation was made by Mr. E. G. Hiller, chairman of the committee, who was supported by the Rev. J. Ruddle, Mrs. Hiller, and Mr. Robert C. Law. These speakers referred in terms of warm praise to Mr. and Mrs. Pilling, and expressed the sincere regret of the members at parting with them and good wishes for their welfare in the future. Mr. Pilling, on behalf of Mrs. Pilling and himself, acknowledged with deep gratitude the good wishes and gifts. As already announced in these columns, the Rev. J. Ruddle will shortly leave this church, having accepted a unanimous invitation from the congregation of the Underbank Chapel, Stannington, near Sheffield. On receipt of his resignation the committee of the church unanimously passed the following resolution, which has been communicated to Mr. Ruddle:—"That in receiving and acknowledging Mr. Ruddle's resignation the committee desire to express their appreciation of the earnest sincerity of his ministry in this church. They feel assured that the influence of Mr. Ruddle's work has had a marked success in the maintenance of the highest ideals of life and duty which it will always be a pleasure to have in their memory. The committee desire to bear witness to the kindly feeling which has always existed between Mr. Ruddle and the members of the church, and to assure Mr. Ruddle that he carries the best wishes of the committee with him into his future work."

Clifton.—The induction of the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., as minister of Oakfield-road Church, took place on Friday evening, Dec. 15. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford offered the prayer of dedication, and the lessons were read by the Revs. Joseph Wain and Rudolf Davis. Dr. John Hunter, of the Trinity Congregational Church, Glasgow, was the preacher, and took for his text Lev. vi. 13, "The fire shall be kept burning upon the altar; it shall never go out." The ideal of prayer, he said, they saw in the life of Jesus, and he pleaded for the quiet hour of worship, that devout aspiration in their lives might become devout character. At the beginning of a new ministry he exhorted them to give religion the first place in their affections and care.

Dukinfield (Appointment).—The Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, B.A., of Chesterfield, has accepted a unanimous invitation of the members of the Old Chapel to become their minister, and will enter upon his duties on March 4, 1906.

Kidderminster.—The Guild of the Good Shepherd in connection with the New Meeting House gave a "Robin" breakfast on Christmas morning to 1,100 poor children in the Town Hall and the adjoining Corn Exchange. The Warden (Rev. J. E. Stronge) presided, and was supported on the platform by the Mayor (Mr. M. Tomkinson, J.P., D.L.), Colonel and Mrs. W. H. Talbot, and other prominent citizens. A large number of friends nearly filled the gallery. The proceedings opened with the singing of a verse of "Hark! the Herald Angels Sing." Mr. Stronge then said a few words of welcome to the children, wishing them all a very Happy Christmas; and conveyed the thanks of all interested in the good work to the Mayor for granting the use of the Town Hall, and for his presence on that occasion. The Mayor expressed his good wishes to all concerned, and called for three cheers for the Warden and all the workers, which were given with hearty good will. After grace had been said, a generous repast was thoroughly enjoyed by the large number of "Robins" present, and during the breakfast three hearty cheers were given for the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, who originated the "Robin" breakfast some years ago. About 100 workers engaged enthusiastically in carrying out the arrangements, and all passed off smoothly and successfully.

THE grace and love abide, though knowledge may pass away, and the forms of thought may change; and if, as many are now obliged to admit, the Teacher himself accepted on some points the opinions of the day which we can no longer accept, that does not effect the substance of the revelation, or diminish the strength of the appeal which the cross makes to our hearts.—James Drummond.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL, S.E.

Appeal for New Subscribers.

THE committee confidently appeal to friends to assist them in maintaining the above Institution. Consequent upon the death of many old Subscribers the funds necessary for carrying on the important mission work in this district have become all too little, and to avoid annual special appeals it is necessary to have the subscription list increased. A subscription of any amount would be gladly welcomed and entitles to membership of the Institution. The following generous response has already been made:—
